I think we should rewrite the first chapter of the Stover at Yale. That's the beginning of Stover's student life and that would be very different if Stover, for example, came to University of Illinois instead of going to an Ivy League school with a very famous name. Our school is not a bad school; however it is at the lower standing than Yale. So if we would explain Stover feelings upon his arrival to University of Illinois let's say he drives or takes the bus. His feelings will differ from the ones he felt when he was feeling to be proud to attend Yale. If Stover came to University of Illinois he wouldn't worry what society to join and what frat to be in. He would probably do more partying and drinking and maybe studying. The beginning of the book is the most essential aspect of Stover's college life.
