tures of the directory is the indication of availability of the material listed. When the library which contains the material needed has been located through the subject index, it is possible in most instances to determine immediately whether or not the material is available through interlibrary loan, duplication, or personal consultation.

The directory is a storehouse of information on a vast amount of research material not generally listed in the standard bibliographies. It will be interesting to note its effect on bringing the researcher and the material together.—Clara Mae Brown, Joint University Libraries.
