INFORMATION RETRIEVAL

Computational and Theoretical Aspects

By H. S. HEAPS

A Volume in the Library and Information Science Series

Information Retrieval was written to achieve a twofold objective. The text first introduces the student of computer science to basic concepts of information retrieval, and describes the techniques required to develop suitable computer programs. It then describes the general structure of the relevant computer programs so that the basic design considerations may be understood by librarians, information officers, and others not well-versed in the details of computer science. Some topics covered in detail include general concepts, the organization of data for computer-accessible storage, query language for information retrieval, information structures, the structure of search programs, and the characteristics of the vocabularies of document data bases. Information Retrieval bridges the gap between computer science and information science. It is an ideal learning tool for information scientists, computer scientists, and library scientists, as well as students in these and related areas.

An outstanding new reference work representing the world's major collection of Caribbeana

Catalogue of the West India Reference Library

Being the National Library of Jamaica

The West India Reference Library represents the world's pre-eminent research collection of West Indian materials—both published and in manuscript. Founded in the late 19th century by the pioneer in the field of Caribbean bibliography, Frank Cundall, the West India Reference Library is a vital source for researchers and scholars interested in studying the social, political, economic, and cultural history of the societies comprising the West Indies. This published catalogue of the Library's collection is therefore an essential source for Caribbean studies.

The Catalogue consists of ten volumes, encompassing the Library's more than 120,000 catalogue cards which have been photo-offset, and allows the user to locate materials by subject, by author, or by title. This unique collection of Caribbeana contains works published from as early as the sixteenth century. In addition to the books and manuscripts listed, the Catalogue also includes current periodicals and serials, pamphlets, published maps and microfilm holdings.

As a source of Caribbean and Caribbean-related materials, the West India Reference Library is regarded as perhaps the finest in the world. This Catalogue of the Library's holdings thus represents one of the most important bibliographic guides ever published to Caribbeana, past and present.
