The person charging this material is responsible for its return to the library from which it was withdrawn on or before the Latest Date stamped below.

Theft, mutilation, and underlining of books are reasons for disciplinary action and may result in dismissal from the University.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

BUILDING USE ONLY

NOV 29 1973

NOV 30 1973

BUILDING USE ONLY

NOV 30 1973

L161 — O-1096
A COMPARISON OF CERTAIN FEATURES OF THE TECHNIQUE OF GEORGE ELIOT'S "MIDDELMARCH" AND "ADAM BEDE"

...BY...

ARTHUR RAYMOND HALL

THESIS

FOR THE DEGREE OF MASTER OF ARTS IN ENGLISH

IN THE GRADUATE SCHOOL

OF THE

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS

1902
UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS

THIS IS TO CERTIFY THAT THE THESIS PREPARED UNDER MY SUPERVISION BY

Arthur Raymond Hall, A. B.

ENTITLED A Companion of Certain Features of the Technique of George Eliot's Middlemarch and Adam Bede.

IS APPROVED BY ME AS FULFILLING THIS PART OF THE REQUIREMENTS FOR THE DEGREE of Master of Arts in the English Course

in the Graduate School

HEAD OF DEPARTMENT OF

English

May 30, 1902
Contents.

Introduction.

I. Outlines.
II. Tables of Space Estimates.

Part I.
Plot Development.

I. The plot of "Adam Bede" and the two leading plots of "Middlemarch".
II. A minor plot in "Middlemarch" - Fred Vincy and Mary Earth.

Part II.
Character Development.

I. Adam Bede and Lydgate.
II. Dinah and Dorothea.
III. Hetty and Rosamond.
IV. Casaubon, Ladislaw, and Arthur.

Conclusion.
Introduction.

A comparison of certain features of the technique of George Eliot's "Middlemarch" and "Adam Bede" will be made along lines herein indicated, for the purpose of determining, in some measure, the methods followed, and the skill shown, by the author in the development of the two novels. We shall confine our efforts to a study of plot and character development, using Professor Fayrer's outlines for such study. These outlines will be reproduced, here, with her permission, and we shall follow them closely. Where specific illustrations cannot be given verbatim, reference will be made to pages in "Middlemarch" and "Adam Bede."

Different methods are used by George Eliot in the development of character. The natural methods are those in which character is revealed by outward, tangible means; as, for example, the actions, or the conversation, of a character. The methods of examination, on the other hand, are those in which the thoughts, feelings, and motives of a character are brought to light through the instrumentality of the author. In order to determine to what extent, and with what effect, the author has used the different methods in the portrayal of a character, we shall make a space estimate for it. This estimate will be based upon the number of lines given to each division of the outline; for example, we count the entire number of lines given to the conversation of Adam Bede, or the lines given to his personal appearance. As the outlines are given in full, further explanation will be unnecessary.

3 I, II, IV, VIII, in outline for space estimates. IX, too, sometimes.
4 II, V, VI, VII, X. in outline for space estimates.

In our study of plot, we shall take up each division of the outline and make a comparison of the plots in "Middlemarch" and "Adam Bede." "Plot," as we use the term, is a complication of events involving a conflict of forces. It is a definite structure, not merely a row of occurrences in accidental juxtaposition. But its conformation may be loose and irregular, or compact and well rounded. Its contours and dividing lines may be determined by a great variety of materials. Plot has a beginning, a main body, and a conclusion. The beginning includes the introduction of characters, and the description of events up to where the conflict of forces begins, while the conclusion gathers up the loose threads after the conflict is over.

1. in outline A is conversation of the character.

2. [Illegible text]

3. Professor O agree.
The meaning of the different divisions of the outlines is generally clear and distinct. It is true, however, that some of the divisions in the outline for space estimates are very closely related; for example, author’s comments and analysis of mental states, consequently, some lines may be found that could be placed under either division. A word of explanation, too, may be necessary in the case of motivation. The motivation of an event is the manner in which it is brought in, and the reason for its introduction. The illustrations given from George Eliot’s own work will, we hope, make intelligible our use of the outlines.
Outline for Space Estimates.

I. Conversation of the character.

II. Actions of the character.

III. Thought-narrative.
   (a) What character thought.

IV. Personal appearance of the character as described by the author.

V. Author's comment:
   (a) What author expresses general traits of character.

VI. Author's analysis or description of mental state of the character.
   (a) What author narrates what goes on in character's mind.

VII. Author's philosophy of life.
   (a) What might be set out in an essay apart from the character.

VIII. Impressions of others as to the character.

IX. Effects of outside influences and conditions on the character.
   (a) What they cause character to do.

X. Effect of character on those around him.
B Outline for Plot Study.

I. Tracing conflict of forces.

II. Motivation examined.
   (a) Note whether over- or under-economized material.

III. Foreshadowing of outcome.

IV. Digressions noted.

V. Movement determined.
   (a) Whether rapid or otherwise.

VI. Combination of different plots noted.

VII. Methods of character drawing most useful for plot development determined.

VIII. Proportion of plot noted.
   (a) Show beginning, climax, and conclusion.

IX. Effect of descriptive passages on the structure noted.

X. Management of transitions, within a plot and between different plots, analyzed.
Space Estimates

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Number</th>
<th>Lydgate</th>
<th></th>
<th>Adams</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>4 1/4 p.</td>
<td>10 9/10 f.</td>
<td></td>
<td>7 8/11 p.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>1 11/16 p.</td>
<td>11 3/5 f.</td>
<td></td>
<td>18 7/11 p.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>1 19 p.</td>
<td>1 17/10 f.</td>
<td></td>
<td>3 p.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5</td>
<td>1 3 p.</td>
<td>1 14 f.</td>
<td></td>
<td>11 3/11 p.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6</td>
<td>1 15 1/11 p.</td>
<td>10 7/10 f.</td>
<td></td>
<td>9 8/11 p.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7</td>
<td>1 1/16 p.</td>
<td>4 3/10 f.</td>
<td></td>
<td>6 5/11 p.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8</td>
<td>5 41 1/4 p.</td>
<td>6 1/6 f.</td>
<td></td>
<td>3 11/11 p.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9</td>
<td>4 3 1/16 p.</td>
<td>5 1/10 f.</td>
<td></td>
<td>8 1/11 p.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10</td>
<td>7 1/1 p.</td>
<td>4 1/6 f.</td>
<td></td>
<td>1 7/11 p.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Total: 93 pp. solid bbl.

Total: 78 pp. solid bbl.

3/4 of the book.

Calculations

1. Value of Oak: $50 \frac{3}{5}$ f.
2. Value of Ash: $48$ f.
3. Value of Beech: $49 \frac{5}{15}$ f.
4. Value of the Oak: $57$ f.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Dorothy</th>
<th>Dinah, Rosamond, Kitty</th>
<th>Radialaw, Arthur</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td>2 1/2</td>
<td>8 ft.</td>
<td>28 1/2 ft.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>9 1/2</td>
<td>9 ft.</td>
<td>15 ft.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>9 1/4</td>
<td>11 1/2 ft.</td>
<td>3 1/2 ft.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>7 1/5</td>
<td>3 1/2 ft.</td>
<td>6 1/2 ft.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>11 ft.</td>
<td>7 1/2 ft.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6</td>
<td>25 1/16</td>
<td>3 1/4 ft.</td>
<td>1 1/2 ft.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7</td>
<td>7 1/15</td>
<td>5 1/2 ft.</td>
<td>3 1/2 ft.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>1 1/2 ft.</td>
<td>4 3/4 ft.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9</td>
<td>7/11</td>
<td>3 1/2 ft.</td>
<td>5 1/2 ft.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10</td>
<td>6 5/11</td>
<td>2 ft.</td>
<td>3 1/2 ft.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

3. Method of Extension

55 1/2 ft. 13 1/2 ft. 4 1/8 ft. 56 1/2 ft. 13 1/2 ft. 50 ft.

4. Method of Extension

4 1/5 ft. 8 7/10 ft. 5 7/10 ft. 4 3/10 ft. 5 6 3/10 ft. 50 ft.
Part I.
Plot Development.
I.
The Plot of "Adam Bede" and the Two Leading Plots of "Middlemarch".

In this chapter we shall make a comparison of the two plots in "Middlemarch," involving the fortunes of Dorothea and Lydgate, with the plot of "Adam Bede." In this comparison the outline already given will be made use of in order to give a more specific cast to our conclusions. It is to be expected that plots from the same master hand will have many points of similarity. That this is true in the novels of "Adam Bede" and "Middlemarch," a very little analysis will show. The same general method is used in both works to complicate the events that involve a conflict of forces; there is, too, in both, much of vital interest to the reader who, somewhere in the story, will surely recognize, in the experiences of the character, similar ones of his own; and again in both, we find the author stepping outside the lines of the plot, in order to advance her philosophical views, or to reveal a peculiar type of character. The same analysis, however, that marks the resemblance will also disclose some points of difference. In "Adam Bede," for example, there is but one plot, one hero; while in "Middlemarch" the reader slowly unravels a tangled web of plots.
George Eliot has given us, in "Middlemarch," two plots of almost equal strength and interest. The intention of making Dorothea Brooke the heroine and leading character of the story changed gradually, as she worked out Edith's character, until she became too deeply interested in this creation to allow it to remain in the background. From his letters we learn that she, at first, intended to call her novel "Miss Brooke," but the change in her plans has resulted in a division of the reader's interest. From the story itself, no one can determine with absolute certainty the author's real intent; consequently each reader is left free to choose between Dorothea and Edith. Personally we were drawn most strongly toward Dorothea, and, when we found that she was to become the wife of a selfish, conceited, and ineradicable old clergyman, we could not repress a feeling of disappointment. We felt that she and Edith were the two congenial spirits, at least, that his was too strong a character to be wasted on a pretty, but shallow and heartless coquette. The lines of the plots, however, took Dorothea farther and farther away, but brought Rosamond, at the same time, into closer relationship with him.

The plot which has Dorothea for its heroine might easily have been made more vital and important. part of the story; and such a plan, we believe, would have added to the strength and interest of the work. As it is, the ninth chapter of the story is almost ended before Lydgate, who is to take the leading role in the companion plot, is introduced. The reader already has become interested in Dorothea, and, naturally, he expects her to be the heroine about whom the rest of the story centers. He sees in her character enough of strength and power to justify his expectation. Other strong characters may be introduced, but, as his sympathies have already gone out toward Dorothea, he wants these characters to be subordinated to the one he has chosen. When, therefore, attention is called to Lydgate, the reader, naturally, connects him with the life and fate of Dorothea. The reader thinks, until their ways begin to separate, that the two will, in some way, be drawn together. Even now after a more careful study of the work, we cannot help feeling that it has lost force and artistic effect by the division of interest.

When, on the other hand, we examine the plot of "Adam Bede," we find one thread running through the story. Our attention, in the second paragraph of the novel, is drawn toward the tall, broad-chested workman, with the strong baritone. The interest thus aroused never flags, and the last chapter shows the same stalwart, muscular workman walking with his old greatness—the pride of all stages of, and our sense. We feel that George Eliot had a definite plan outlined in her own mind from the beginning, and that, although she may have felt called upon to deviate slightly from this plan, such deviations were forced upon her by circumstances arising out of the development of her characters. The continuity of the plot cannot be questioned, up to the point where Adam, after bidding Arthur good-bye, left the Hermitage, feeling that sorrow was more bearable now, hatred was gone. Beyond this point there is a difference of opinion, the marriage of Adam and Dimah seeming to be, to some readers, a forced outcome. That the author may have considered the possibility of such an outcome is, as certain passages in the novel indicate, not at all unlikely; but, though we shall note some of these passages later, we are constrained to admit that, from an artistic point of view, the last six chapters were the beauty of the plot. The fact remains, however, that, with this possible exception, the plot is strong, interesting, and well proportioned.

We shall, using our outline for plot study as a guide, begin now, a comparison of plot characteristics. Adam and Sarah are both introduced to us at the beginning, and are personally described by the author. Lydgate receives his introduction to the reader in an indirect way, when Lady Chettam says to the gossiping Mrs. Cadwallader, 'Tell me about this new young surgeon, Mr. Lydgate. I am told he is wonderfully clever; he certainly looks it—a fine brow indeed." Lydgate is a newcomer in Middlemarch; but we find Dorothea in her home at the Grange, and Adam, in the home of his childhood in the village of Ingleslope, at the work shop of Mr. Jonathan Bunge, carpenter and builder. Thus it happens that we start out with clear, distinct impressions of Adam and Dorothea, but with vague, uncertain notion about Lydgate.

The author has constructed the Dorothea plot along lines which appeal more strongly to the tender side of our natures, than does the Lydgate plot. She makes both Dorothea and Ladislaw lovable characters, thus adding a touch of feeling to the artistic effect of the plot. The plot, as a unit, shows good proportions. The amount of space devoted to the introduction of the characters, and to the laying of the foundation of the story is necessary for the author's purpose. The same thing is true of the plot of "Adam Bede," but the symmetry of the Lydgate plot is less perfect. Lydgate is the hero of "Middlemarch," and yet less than one half the number of pages in the book—less even than the number given to the Dorothea plot—is given to the plot in which he is the central figure.

If, now, we examine the movement of the different plots, we find that the Lydgate, and the Dorothea plots are at the two extremes of movement, the one slow, the other rapid; while the Adam plot takes a middle ground. The amount of space given to analysis in the Lydgate plot necessarily retards plot movement. In many scenes, the characters move and act with great freedom; and in Lydgate's case, with great impetuosity; the plot then deepens rapidly, and in the betrothal scene, its lines converge with a rush. However, the scenes of action alone quickly give way to analysis; the general movement is slow. In the Dorothea plot, on the contrary, movement is swift. Events come in quick succession; for example, Dorothea is introduced to the reader, and almost immediately the way is prepared for the meeting with Casaubon, which leads to a remarkably short courtship and marriage. The movement of the plot in "Adam Bede" is sometimes slow, as in the beginning, when the homes and the characters are being described. The plot thickens rapidly after the scene between between Hetty and Arthur in Mrs. Teggs's dairying; until that first meeting in the wood, the action is then retarded for a time, while the author analyzes the feelings of Arthur, Hetty, and Adam, and then events follow each other swiftly to the final separation from Hetty. In "Middlemarch" the author has not always been able to make the transitions from one plot to another, even passably natural and plausible. Some of the changes have been cleverly managed, while others are laborious and awkward. To combine three plots smoothly, and to introduce them, representatives of every rank and station in Middlemarch, as the author has tried to do, would be well-nigh impossible. In chapter XIII., for example, the author goes from one plot to another, and then awkwardly returns again. The Dorothea plot seems to move with the least friction. Scenes in the same chapter change easily and naturally; if there is a break in the course of the story, a new chapter takes up the threads. When Lydgate and Rosamond are first mentioned in chapter X., their introduction seems natural, and paves the way for the opening of the Lydgate plot in the next chapter.

Unfortunate breaks like the ones found in "Middlemarch" do not occur in "Adam Bede." Everything here moves smoothly. One illustration will, perhaps, make clear the easy, natural transitions from one scene to another. At the end of the first chapter, we see Adam on his way home, hastening with long strides down the highway. It is not strange that an elderly horseman should meet him and turn to have another look at the stalwart workman in 'paper cap,' whose splendid physique would attract attention anywhere. We follow the horseman to Nayslop, and, while the hostler is watering his horse, we hear the landlord of the Romney Arms tell him that "a young woman is going to preach in the Town." The traveler rides on and stops at the Town to see the young Methodist woman. In this way we are led gently along from the workshop to the assemblage on the Town; from a description of Adam to a meeting with Bink. Our introduction to Kitty comes in just as interesting a way. News of Thine Brei's death is announced to the rector, as he and Arthur are preparing to take their morning ride. Mr. Swincoe's duty, as well as his own feel-ings, prompt a call upon Adam; and Arthur, too, is anxious to offer his sympathy to his young friend. On their way, however, Arthur wants to stop at the Hall Farm to look at the wholes Cocow is keeping for him. A clever scheme, perhaps, but he sees the pretty buttonmaker!

We look almost in vain, in "Middlemarch," for clever descriptive passages. The ride to Stone Court brings out one pleasing bit of description, but even this has very little bearing on the story itself. Such passages, however, are numerous in "Adam Bede," and the author uses them with great skill to give clear pictures of the scenes and setting in which the characters live and move. She gains our sympathy and makes useful that we are in touch with real life. That loaf of work shop seems strangely familiar! And the grey shep herd dog curled up there in the chimney, recalling the woolly, romping playmate of childhood days! The description of the meeting on the Green brings to mind another image familiar to American pioneer settlers: the author thatch roofs and dark red tiles become slates and pine shingles; the young Methodist woman changes to gray-haired circuit rider; but the villagers are there, and our imaginations fill out the scene.

That George Eliot has a tendency toward digression becomes apparent as we study her work. In a novel like "Middlemarch," where so many conflicting interests make themselves felt, we have little trouble in finding digressions: the real difficulty lies in choosing representative ones. Mr. Brooke's encounter with Dolly, for instance, might be omitted without loss of interest or break in the plot. The same is true of the chapter in "Adam Bede" where Mrs. Poyser has her say out. The conversation between Dinah and Mr. INevins, although it helps in the portrayal of Dinah's character, is hardly necessary to a clear understanding of the trend of the plot, but chapter XVII., in which, as the author says, the story pauses a little, has even less to commend it to the reader. The description of the old-fashioned English honest sufferer, coming as it does, so near the end of the plot, will be to many readers, wearisome digression.

A comparison of the conflict of forces in the plots under consideration shows a somewhat similar power at work in the Dorothia and Adam plots, but an entirely different one in the Lydgate plot. In both of the former, love, and hope, and fear, and bitter jealousy struggle for the mastery. In the other plot, financial troubles, a man's ambition, and a woman's perverseness are the contending forces. In Lydgate plot, as already noted, has its beginning in the remark of Lady Chettam, which turns attention to Lydgate. The author reveals the controlling ambition of Lydgate's earlier years to do a "good small work for Middlemarch," and "a great work for the world." By making important discoveries in medicine and surgery, but she also shows that he is careless and indifferent as to his expenditures. Rosamond, we soon learn, is wilful and absolutely selfish and unconcerned about any interests save her own. She is building high hopes on the position and wealth of the young physician, but that seems to accord well with his desire to rise in the world. A possibility of clash-that he does not believe that Hydgate has a farthing, or will ever make an income; the way he goes on. Rosamund, however, keeps on planning in the full assurance that in the end, everything will work out right. Such assurance must, we feel, bring regret and disappointment. Even Mrs. Bulstrode, in her tender solicitude for her niece's welfare, wonders what this girl, brought up in luxury, will do on a small income. Hydgate, though, is himself, largely responsible for the coming storm, for he incurs obligations blindly, and with no apparent thought of future accounting. The climax is hurried on by inopportune creditors. The bill of sale becomes a necessity; and Rosamund coldly accepts the inevitable. Ambition loses its power over Hydgate; his financial difficulties increase. Rosamund's selfish, unbending will meets him at every turn; the two drift farther and farther apart. She a hopelessly baffled and beaten man, she with unconquered will, a wretched and unhappy woman.

On the Dorothea plot, on the other hand, we feel from the moment that Casaubon becomes Dorothea's accepted suitor, that a conflict of forces will come. The betrothed are unfitted for each other; they have little interest in common; real love has no part in the unnatural and uncongenial alliance. A faint note of discord comes even before the marriage, in Casamon's wish to be free in Rome. The positive conflict begins with Ladislaw's first visit to Mrs. Casamon. This visit lights a spark of jealousy in Casamon, that smolders for a time, then explodes into an inquenchable flame. By a codicil to his will he attempts to put Dorothea forever beyond the reach of Ladislaw. Death intervenes to prevent the promise which he wanted Dorothea to make, and which would have embittered her whole after life. The ineditive codicil prolongs the conflict for a few weeks; then comes the love-scene described in this charming way:—Her lips trembled and so did his. It was never known which lips were the first to move towards the other lips; but they kissed tremblingly and then they moved apart. Still Ladislaw despair, but Dorothea removes any bar to their marriage by the passionate outburst, "I don't mind about poverty—I hate my wealth."

In the Adam plot, however, it is love and jealousy in another form, that will cause the discord. The conflict here is not between husband and wife and outside influences, but between rivals for a woman's favor. Arthur, by reason of family rank and station, pleads his love in secret only; but Kitty's childish dreams build splendid pictures of luxury and ease. The quick intuition of her woman's heart tells her that Captain Dornithorne will take a good deal of trouble for the chance of seeing her. As the author develops the plot, the rising passion which has in store so much of pain and misery, becomes a maelstrom from which, we feel, there can be no escape. Kitty and Arthur take their first walk in the Chase. This little picaresque story about Craig, the gardener, brings tears of vexation to her eyes, and then his arm steals comforting around her. "In the evening tears come to her eyes, and when she thinks he is not coming to meet her, but he does come, she sees her tears again; and again his arm steals around her waist." Tightening its clasp as he bends to meet her "pointing child life." Now they look at each other, but not quite as they had looked before; for in their eyes there is the memory of a kiss. Arthur goes home, very nervoustingly with passionate love, resolved to tell Mr. Irvine, and thereby to end the dangers of secret love; but Kitty, in her love bed chamber, lives over again in dreams, those happy moments, feels again those sweet caresses. Above memories of Kitty's newly awakened passions lives on in hope and trusting confidence. His jealousy is, indeed, aroused at the dance, when he sees her pretty locket; but he quiets his jealous fears. Almost immediately comes the climax—he finds Kitty and Arthur in the wood. Arthur's letter is written and delivered now, and this shattering of Kitty's little dream-world changes her passionate love, for a time, into hatred. The captain goes to join his company, and Kitty turns gradually to Adam, for she wants to be consoled, to feel again as if Arthur were near. But that hidden dread comes like a spectre, at which she herself trembles and shudders, and then she flies to hide the coming shame.

With no approach for the wonderer, Adam comes back, from his unsuccessful search to find Kitty in prison charged with murdering her child. After the trial, Adam's courtship of Dinah brings out, it is true, a struggle between love and duty, which ends in the harmonizing of that duty with love; but the conflict of forces of the real plot ends with the trial scenes.

We shall examine now the motivation of events in the plot, in order to determine whether the author introduces scenes abruptly, or carefully prepares his readers beforehand for their introduction. Any little study of the Adam plot leads us to the conclusion that George Eliot is exceptionally careful in "Adam Bede" to prepare the reader for every new scene. Nothing is allowed just to happen; the element of surprise is almost entirely eliminated; the characters, alone, are kept in suspense. A few scenes will suffice for illustration. The little scene in the workshop, where Beth has forgotten the panels in his tools, prepares the way for the preaching on the Green. Why Ben laughs at Beth about his "Methodies," and wonder whether it was the person's pretty face or her "armament" which made him forget the panels. Beth good-humoredly replies that she is going to preach on the Green tonight, and invites Ben to come and hear her. One of the best motivated scenes of the whole story is that meeting between Kitty and Arthur in the wood. While in Mrs. Rogers's caring, Arthur asks Kitty why she does not sometimes walk in the Chase, it is so green and pleasant. She shyly answers that she does go through there sometimes, and that she is going again to-morrow. The desire to meet each other there alone, takes root in both their hearts, and no one reader could be surprised to meet them in the Chase. Rather he feels that such a meeting is inevitable after the daily scene. One strange case of motivation in the handling of characters is the introduction of the elderly horseman who meets Adam on the highway, and whose reins in his horse near the Green to listen to Dinah's words of exhortation. Further drops out of our story completely, until he reappears as the magistrate, who gains, for Dinah, admission to Nettie's prison cell. The imaginary tappings of the willow wand on Adam's door prepares, too, for the death of Thos. Bole. If we criticize the motivation in "Adam Bede" in any way, we are compelled to say that many readers, even though the author may have hinted at such an outcome, are hardly prepared for Adam's sudden realization of his great love for Dinah.

The events in the Dorothea plot in "Middlemarch" are also well motivated. We do not, for example, feel any surprise at Casaubon's sudden death, because Doctor Lydgate has already explained that such a result is not improbable. Lydgate's visit to Enrick Manor, and his unconscious betrayal of Rosamond's opposition to his plans, prepare naturally for Dorothea's sympathetic visit to Rosamond. The middleclass round of Mrs. Cadwallader, on the contrary, on which she learns of Dorothea's engagement, and hence the unpleasant news to Sir James, might very well be left out.

In the Lydgate plot, however, some scenes come out naturally, while others seem to have an element of chance in them. One example will suffice. We read that Lydgate one evening sat down by Rosamond and looking closely at her face, said "in his gentler tone, ..."
Dear! The author breaks off abruptly to explain how they came to be alone. This seems to be an unnecessary interruption.

The greatest difference, perhaps, between the plots in "Middlemarch" and in "Adam Bede" lies in the foreshadowing of future events. In the former, such foreshadowing is vague and indistinct, almost as if the author were trying to keep her readers in the dark; but in the Adam plot the future events cast their shadows before them, clear and definite. Two passages in the Rylegate plot seem to foreshadow events to come: namely: "But Rylegate was less ripe, and might possibly have experience before him, which would modify his opinion as to the most excellent thing in woman;" and "Rylegate, in fact, was already conscious of being fascinated by a woman strikingly different from Miss Brooke."

Foreshadowing in the Dorothea plot, too, is somewhat indefinite. The lines of the plot do not seem to be tending, as in "Adam Bede," toward one inevitable conclusion. It is true we soon feel that Dorothea with her peculiarities may easily be led to accept the fated clergyman. During his first visit, for example, "Dorothea said to herself that Mr. Casaubon was the most interesting man she had ever seen." The influence which Dorothy comes to have over Lady Larnie indistinctly pointed out, when at their first meeting, he was surprised into thinking, "what a voice! It was like the voice of a soul that had once lived in an Aeolian harp."

An examination of the Adam plot shows that the outcome early grows from indistinct premonitions into almost tragic certainty. The following passages will show how the trend of the plot is pointed out in advance. Lizbeth Bide says of Adam, "He set his heart on that Kitty Somel, as all miners save a penny." Arthur, too, tells Mr. Swiney long before the birthday feast that Adam shall manage his woods for him. 3 The close relations of Kitty and Arthur show in these passages: "She had asked him tremblingly to let kinks with him and be married;" and Adam who knew half their secret, would rather help them to keep it than betray it;" and "It was an unfortunate business." Kitty, also, had forebodings when the uncertainty of the future, the possibilities to which she could give no shape, began to press upon her; and, after the first coming of her great dread . . . . she had waited and waited, in the blind vague hope that something would happen to set her free from her terror. That Kitty must suffer for her own, and Arthur's wrongdoing, becomes all too plain. Some foreshadowing of Dinah's love, too.
though not so definite, may be noted. When she met Adam in the cottage "he looked at her with the concentrated, examining glance which a man gives to an object in which he has suddenly begun to be interested while she, "for the first time in her life, felt a painful self-consciousness ... A faint blush came."

We have no cause to examine how plots are combined in "Adam Bede," for there is but the one central plot, whose lines, if followed closely, will include everything of interest. But in "Middlemarch," there are minor plots, besides the two parallel plots, to divide our interest, and to complicate the situations. We have first, the Dorntone plot, and, bound closely to it, the little plot involving the interests of Celia and the Chettans. Next comes the Lydgate plot, and its small companion plot, involving the interests of Fred Sivry and Mary Earth. Then too, there is still another plot which has to do with the life history of Bulstrode.
The minor plots are, however, very closely related to their major plots on account of family relationship.
The two main plots, also, have a common bond, because of the sympathetic feeling existing between Dorotha and Lydgate; but even then, the unity and the coherence so noticeable in "Adam Bede" are far from pro-

3.108.
incert.

To develop her plot, the author resorts to different methods, but her favorite plan is by analysis. Conversation has some part in plot development, but the use of thought, narrative, author’s comment, and philosophy of life, is much more effective. These latter methods are used almost entirely to advance the Dorothea plot. Conversation, to be sure, helps, when Cecilia and Dorothea discuss Mr. Casaubon; still, Dorothea’s mental discussions give us a clear view of plot movement. For instance, a direct advance is made in plot when the thought enters her mind that Mr. Casaubon might wish to make her his wife. Again, the author’s philosophy of life is frequently used to make the reader feel that a seeming unnatural action may take place without violating common rules of human conduct. Contrary to her usual custom, the author has resorted, in “Adam Bede,” to a large use of conversation for plot advancement; but, on the whole, thought, narrative and author’s comment have been used to the best advantage for that purpose. The author is very successful in describing the inner feelings of her characters. At this point, her use of conversation is not only convincing but also adds to the richness of the plot development. We are forced to admit, now, as we lay aside the two novels, that, when compared with "Middlemarch," "Adam Bede" makes the lack of unity in the former story most clearly evident. "Middlemarch" leaves us with a feeling of uncertainty: three plots, at least, are strong enough to distract our attention; and three heroines haunt our dreams. "Adam Bede," on the contrary, holds our interest and sympathy close to the central figure of the story, especially to the hero, Adam.
II.

A Minor Plot in "Middlemarch."

Fred Vincy and Mary Earle.

Fred Vincy and Mary Earle are actors in one of the minor plots which form the setting and background for the two leading plots in "Middlemarch." The author has without apparent effort, created these two attractive and interesting characters in order to advance the interests of the more prominent principals, Lydgate and Dorothea. The Vincy plot is only a turning aside from the main story, but nevertheless we have the little digression with regret. George Eliot, whether intentionally, or otherwise, has given this plot too much of strength, too much of human interest, for it to be passed over lightly.

There are no minor plots in "Adam Bede" with which to compare this little one. In that first scene in the claystop workshop the reader seems to see, in the actions of Seth, the beginning of a genuine plot, but Dinah's answer comes before the story is fairly started, and blights the rising hopes of Seth. Just one little hint of courtship not affecting Kitty in Adam, occurs after the third chapter has revealed Seth's fate. At the wedding of Adam and Dinah, Bessy Cranage "was crying, though she did not exactly know why," and Wang Sun "who stood near her, judiciously suggested" to Bessy, that the best thing for her step was to follow Dumas's example, and marry an honest fellow who was ready to love her. Beside from this we love scenes come to draw attention to characters outside the lines of the main plot.

The Viney plot begins, when Fred, "the family leggant," comes down to breakfast, and Rosamond, with the evident intention of giving Fred a few of jealousies, introduces Mary with the court speech, "I suppose Mary Smith admires Mr. Rydgate." The climax in the plot, however, is reached in chapter LVI., when Fred decides to forsake a professional life, and to begin work with Mr. Smith. From his interest in the Viney plot as held in suspense, while the lines of the major plots are converging, until chapter LXXXVI. brings us to its ending in this charming picture:

"Tell me seriously that all this is true; and that you are happy because of it — because you love me best."

"It is all true, Fred, and I am happy because of it — because I love you best."

The movement of this plot seems very slow. All the minor plots are subordinated to the main ones. Fred and Mary come on the scenes whenever they are needed for the purposes of the main plots, consequently the lines of our short plot are broken and irregular. Some chapters sometimes intervene, leaving no trace of Fred or Mary, and then perhaps one of them may come in for passing mention. These transitions from scene to scene, from plot to plot, as well as the lack of descriptive passages in "Middlemarch," were mentioned in our study of the Lydgate plot.

The conflict of forces in the Vincy plot arises through Fred's recklessness and Mary's abhorrence of idleness. The first intimation of Mary's feelings on the subject of Fred's spendthrift ways, come to us in her reply to Rosamond who has called him conceited. She wishes that no one said any worse of him, and then too, she thinks that "he is not fit to be a clergyman." Fred, however, gets still more idle and reckless, while Mary's determination, not to become anything more than a friend to one as unsteady, grows stronger. She tells Fred that she can never marry any one who is dependent upon the favors of a rich relative, or who becomes a clergyman because that is an easy, respectable position, while his habits remain worldly. It is hard for Fred, who dreads disagreeable things, to make a decision, and, especially, one that seems to forebode hard shock for him; but his great love for Mary outweighs his own dislike for work, and he makes the agreement with Mr. Borth which makes possible a future union with Mary. The ending of the conflict completes a short plot in the treatment of which, the author seems to be more successful than in the Lydgate plot.

We ought not to question the author's motivation in this minor plot, for many of the scenes are brought in to advance the two main plots. Chapter XI, in which Fred and Mary are first introduced to the reader, is a strange mixture of sentiment, philosophy, and commonplace matters. We can hardly say that George Eliot planned this chapter with her usual skill, when we examine the different interests concerned in it. In chapter XIX, on the other hand, the correspondence between Fred and Mary seems well-planned. Three chapters are given to Fred's horse-trading, and events connected therewith, but the importance of these events hardly justifies the use of so much material. Somewhat later, in chapter LII, the author prepares cleverly for the visit of Mr. Fairbrother to Mary, to intercede for Fred. The last chapter presents a charming and well-motivated scene. Fred Calid Earth led Mary to feel that it will be a long time before Fred gets ahead much, and then, when she seems fully resigned to such a condition, he tells her of the bright prospects awaiting Fred, as assistant superintendent at Stone Court. This good news is surely a pleasant subject for revision, as Fred and Mary linger there together on the doorstep.

There are very few words spoken in the Vivian plot, either by the characters, or by the author, which give us a direct clue to the final outcome of the plot. Here and there we can trace just a slight foreshadowing of future events, but they are indistinct and indefinite. It is this vague uncertainty which so plainly distinguishes
...as "Middlemarch" from "Dorothea Berrie. If the illustrations have been chosen, can, in any case, be called foreshadowing of the future, they are far from being satisfactory. Mrs. Darcy, in chapter XI, in speaking of Mary's youth, calls her a "dreadful plain girl," whereas she, she replies at once, "Every one would not agree with you there, mother." Perhaps, perhaps, is Fred's declaration, when Rosamond turns to him about what Mary says, that, of course, he cares what Mary says, she is the best girl he knows.

The Vincy plot touches here and there, events in the two main plots. Fred as the brother of Rosamond, naturally has a part in the affairs of his sister and Lydgate. Fred's severe attack of fever serves as an excellent excuse for calling in Dr. Lydgate, and gives Rosamond the desired opportunity to make the young doctor's acquaintance. Mary, on the contrary, has very little to do with the lines of the main plots. She has one tête-à-tête with Rosamond, which, to be sure, advances the Lydgate plot, but it also advances the plot in which she, herself, is so deeply interested.

Our study of this plot in detail makes clear, however, what methods of character-drawing the author uses most successfully, here, to advance plot interest. Fred and Mary act and talk, and through their actions and their conversation, the plot is gradually developed. George Eliot does not advance the plot by revealing the innermost thoughts of the two simple, but fascinating characters.
Neither does she philosophize, nor resort to her usual methods of examination to bring out plot lines, and yet she gains a definite effect. In this little plot, minor though it may be, the author succeeds in presenting clearly the lines of a charming and attractive love story, that appeals with subtle force and power to all hearts. At the same time we should hardly be justified in treating a minor plot with such fulness, were it not for the fact that the minor plot forms such a contrast to the other plots found in "Middlemarch."
Part II.
Character Development.

I.
Adam Bede and Lydgate.

The object of our comparison of Adam and Lydgate is to show by what methods the author develops character, and to analyze these methods in order to ascertain their value and the skill of the author in using them. Reference will be made from time to time to our space estimates in the appended tables for the purpose of determining the amount of material used by the author to produce given effects. We shall deal first with those divisions in our outline for character study which have to do with the outward, tangible manifestations of character, as for example, speech and actions; and then we shall take up the divisions which treat of examination or analysis of a character's thoughts, feelings, and motives. In general, the former divisions are used to bring out prominent points of personality; the latter, to indicate the lines along which the character moves, that is, advancement of plot interests.

In comparing Adam Bede with Lydgate, we shall follow our outline more closely than in our later comparisons. These two characters are representative topics of the life and surroundings in which they move and act. A discussion of the methods used by the author in developing these two characters will, therefore, in large measure, apply to his other creations; consequently, after a careful study of Adam and Lydgate, we may speak in more general terms of Dorothea, Solly, and the other characters in "Middlemarch" and "Adam Bede."

A reference to our table shows that about one fourth of "Adam Bede" is devoted to Adam himself, while Lydgate takes up only one-seventh of "Middlemarch" merly seven pages is less than the amount of space devoted to Dorothea Brooke. Of the amount of space used in Adam's presentation, 51.2% is given to conversation, actions and other external manifestations of character, in contrast to 48.8% in the case of Lydgate. We shall note, at this point, the principal differences between the space estimates for Adam and Lydgate. Adam we find, talks freely, 37.1%, of the amount of space given to Adam, being taken up with his conversation, as against 26.7% for Lydgate. The thoughts of Adam receive 18.3% of the whole space used, while the author uses but 11.7% in portraying Lydgate's thoughts. She uses 11.5% for her comment on Adam's character, but 14% on that of Lydgate; again 9.3% is all she uses in analyzing or describing Adam's mental state, while she takes 16.5% for lgylgatis. No marked differences appear in the remainder of the divisions.

The greatest disagreement in the relative proportions of the divisions just noted, is in the amounts of space devoted to conversation. About five hundred more lines are given to Adam's conversation than to Igylgatis. At least one-third of the whole amount of space given to Adam is devoted to his conversation, and yet, our first impression of Adam is that he is a man of few words, by disposition taciturn. This impression, however, changes rapidly, for we soon come to feel that conversation will play an important part in the development of Adam's character. The author makes him speak at length on his religious belief, and on his philosophical views, and, in this way, he reveals the deep religious nature and the almost stern earnestness of the man. He says that Adam feels no anxiety about speaking, not being troubled with small vanity or lack of words; thus making us appreciate the self-confidence of the man in whom we might look for difference. By his conversation, too, she shows his frankness and his firmness; for, when decision is needed, she allows him to waste no words, but makes him go directly to the point. It is in his conversation, also, that the author brings out the plain, rugged honesty of the man. We feel that he despises false show and insincerity. That he is impatient, impulsive, strong-willed, and independent comes out often in his conversation. The author shows in the same way that Adam is a man to be trusted, that although rather quick-tempered and rash, he is conscientious, and is controlled by his sense of duty. The simple, natural frankness of the man comes out again in his greeting, "It's an awd to you, brought me drink." The stern and uncompromising nature of the man is revealed in his own words when he says, "I'm apt to be harsh. I'm hard—'t's my nature. I was too hard with my father for doing wrong. I've been a bit hard to everybody but her." In those scenes at the trial, the author makes every word of Adam reveal the depth of his character and the strength of his will. All the traits of character just mentioned are brought out distinctly, again and again, in Adam's own conversation. If then George Eliot can give us definite a portrayal of character by means of speech, we are led to conclude that she could dispense with much of the analysis which forms so large a proportion of character development in "Middlemarch."
Lydgate: conversation, on the contrary, seems to be far less skilfully handled. He talks entertainingly, at times, of his profession, but too often, he is carried away by that subject, and branches out into discussions which fail to interest the unscientific reader. The result of this is, that the reader not only loses interest, but he fails to get any definite impression of the character. The ambition of the scientifically inclined Lydgate must, of course, be shown in the novel, but it could be brought out by suggestion more subtly than the author has succeeded in doing by conversation. Lydgate, as shown by conversation, is, like Adam,reticent when his personal affairs are concerned; for example, note how coldly he receives Mr. Fairbrother's delicate offer of confidence. By his conversation, too, Lydgate impresses us as a man of strong feeling and strong will, but this impression changes gradually, as we observe his futile attempts to control his own family affairs. His impulsiveness comes out clearly in the dialogue with Laura and again when the tears of the circus lass him on to make his ardent declaration of love. His sarcasm, his blunt, outspoken way, and his lack of tact are also brought out in his conversation.

By the actions of Lydgate, the author shows us a kindhearted, but rash and impulsive man. She has not attempted to make a clever actor out of him, but at the same time, she makes his every action reveal these traits of character. In the election of Gyte, she uses the opposition of the men opposed to Bulstrode, to bring out Lydgate's defiant, determined nature. Unless Rosamond has too recently angered him, his tender regard for women kind shows in his actions toward her. Of an intensely loving disposition, Lydgate is very susceptible to the influence of feminine charms, and the author cleverly reveals this trait of character by the impulsive actions of the man.

The author's management of the actions of Adam Bede, shows a marked similarity to his treatment of the actions of Lydgate. She makes the actions of both men reveal their sometimes rash, but always firm resolution. Again she makes the abrupt, quick-tempered, and impulsive actions of both, hide but poorly, their kind and generous natures. The author makes Adam's character stand out exceptionally clear and prominent by his actions. It is in this way that, from the beginning of the first chapter, to the end of the epilogue, the weakness and the strength of the man are revealed. In this first chapter, his actions disclose the harsh, unyielding nature of the sturdy, conscientious workman, whose daily life is tempered by a depth, almost stern, religious feeling. This hard, unyielding nature reveals itself, too, in the deep flush of anger which passes rapidly over Adam's face, when he throws off his jacket, rolling up his shirt sleeves again, and seizes a plank to work up into the coffin, that his idle father should have finished. In his courtship of Betty, he is shown as a big, kind-hearted, but awkward and bashful man, unschooled in the insinuating ways of polite society. The author brings out the strong feelings and violent temper of the man; that, usually, are under the control of his powerful will, when she allows the animal instinct within him to exercise temporary control, as he springs upon Arthur like a maddened beast. She makes us feel, too, that Adam, much more than Hydgate, is a man of action; he does not haitate; he does not change his course. How quickly he comes to a decision, when his mother, that Sunday morning, turns his thoughts toward Dinah! Long before the sun has begun to dip rapidly in the west, she is on her way to the Hall Farm to declare his love.

George Eliot seems to have taken more

1 p. 38.  2 p. 277.  3 p. 455.
than her usual pains to give us a clear picture of Adam's personal appearance. The first description of our hero is so natural, so suggestive, that we see before us, the "large-boned, muscular man, with his sleeves rolled up above the elbow." In chapter XIX. "Adam on a Working-day," the author has given us a much clearer description of Adam, than she anywhere gives of Lydgate, when she describes the keen, black eyes, belonging to this broad-shouldered man with the bare muscular arms and the thick, firm black hair tossed about like trodden meadow-grass whenever he takes off his jacket. Another picture of Adam, too, she stamps indelibly on our mind. On the eve of the trial, we should hardly know that it is Adam sitting there in that gloomy Stoniton room. She tells us that his face has grown "thinner this last week," that he has the sunken eyes, the neglected beard of a man just risen from a sick bed. "His heavy black hair hangs over his forehead, and there is no active impulse in him which inclines him to push it off, that he may be more awake to what is around him." Surely the reader could ask for no better description of Adam's personal appearance, but how differently Lydgate is treated. Not a paragraph, not a line in all "Middlemarch."
remains with us to suggest a life. The image of the young physician, with his large, white hands, the author makes the only striking feature in his description.

The impressions of others as to Lydgate's character are like the description of his personal appearance, noted but little by the author. These impressions are almost entirely from prejudiced sources; consequently, they do not reveal the true character of the man. Even the impressions of Rosamond are sadly biased for she has predeter originally to ensure the talented young man of good family. The author, however, by setting out these impressions of others against the more correct impressions which the reader receives in other ways, emphasize, by the contrast, traits of character brought out by his other methods. Dorothea alone gives us an impartial and disinterested judgment of Lydgate, and one that helps directly in character development. Most of the impressions, on the contrary, aid, only indirectly, in the portrayal of character, but help to advance plot interests.

The impressions of others as to Adam's character are uniformly to his credit, and give us some notion of the man. They enforce and make more definite the characteristics that are shown by other methods. The author makes Mr. O'Farrell say: 'Adam Bede may be working for wages now, but he'll be a master-man some day.' By a clever touch, too, the good qualities in Adam are shown, when she tells me, that Arthur believes implicitly in Adam's honesty, and that Mr. Durnin respects him as much as any man living.

The effect of outside influences on our characters, and the effect which these characters have on the people around them, are of little force in the author's portrayal of character. The effects which naturally arise out of the love affairs of a character are to be expected, for two lovers act and react upon each other. Since the effects noted in 'Adam Bede' and 'Middlemarch' are mostly of this nature, and, as statistics have already been given, it is hardly necessary to examine the two methods here.

The methods of examination and analysis, however, which the author uses so largely and so well, will be carefully studied. She delights to analyze the inmost thoughts and feelings of her characters. In her treatment of Adam, she devotes so much space to his conversation, that the amount given to examination is relatively less than is usual with her; but when she takes up Lydgate, the proportions return again to the normal.

The first of these methods of examination is thought-narrative. The author has not used this method to any great extent in the development of Polygnot’s character; hence we shall study its use in Adam Bade. Here we find that she has given almost 20% of the space devoted to Adam, to thought-narrative. Adam is represented as a man of deep feelings, a man who thinks and reasons for himself; consequently, the narration of his thoughts will have more than ordinary importance. As the author reproduces the thoughts which pass through Adam’s mind during that long night’s work over Tholos’ coffins, she shows us the best side of his nature. The impatience and harshness which, in Adam, are so near the surface, and which are stirred up by his father’s heedlessness, give way under the author’s subtle touch, to that other feeling of devotion to duty which makes his, an heroic character. To show his resolute purpose to bear his troubles bravely, and to care for his mother and Seth, the author tells us that he reflects, that it would make a poor balance, when his doings are cast up at the last, if his poor old mother stood on the wrong side. His back is broad enough, and strong enough; she would be no better than a coward to go away, and leave the troubles to be borne by them as are not half as able. By this charming bit of thought narrative, George Eliot reveals the greatness of Adam’s character, his determination to do his duty bravely at whatever cost. In chapter XI, by the same method, the author presents another side of Adam’s character. She lays the heart of the man bare before us, and portrays the thoughts of a strong man who is confident of his own powers, and absolutely fearless in his dealings with men, but who shrinks tremblingly from an avowal of his love. By the use of thought narrative, too, the author emphasizes the strong passions of the man. Bitter jealousy toward Arthur is set off against intense love for Hetty. After the crisis the author gives us another fine picture in which the best in Adam is again triumphant; he accepts his lot with resignation, feeling that it is God’s will, and that he is not the only man who has had to do without much happiness.

As the preceding method of thought narrative is not used with much effect by the author in portraying Lydgate’s character, so, too, author’s comment is ineffective. In his general comment on his character she deals more directly with the progression of plot.
In the character of Adam, on the contrary, the author comments at length on general traits. She shows us, in this way, that Adam is at once penetrating and credulous, that he has an "inward impatience of uncertainty," and that he desires to "subdue sadness by his strong will and strong arm." She uses this method, too, to strengthen those traits in Adam's character which are brought out more directly, perhaps, by other methods. His deep religious nature, and his resignation to his lot are emphasized in this way. It is by her comment that the author shows the fine qualities of leadership in Adam. She reveals his worth, too, by showing that he has become well-nigh indispensable to Mr. Burgo's business. Good homely work for his employer is a part of his religion. In her comment on Dimak's power over Adam, the author shows us the character in its full power and strength. The stern repression of years bursts out, now, into mature and perfect love.

The analysis of the mental state of a character on the contrary receives less attention proportionately, at the hands of the author in Adam's case, than in Lydgate's. The difference may, perhaps, be accounted for, from the fact that Adam's character is shown more strongly by his conversation, by thought and narrative, and in comment.

1 p. 117. 2 p. 106. 3 p. 187. 4 p. 194. 5 p. 246. 6 p. 437. 7 p. 455.
by the author, George Eliot, seems to be deeply in love with this character, and consequently, in its development, she makes frequent use of personal comment and thought portrayed. One trait in Adam's character—his kindness toward weaker creatures—the author reveals in the treatment of Eve. At a time when Adam's mental calm is sadly disturbed by his father's dissipation, the author uses mental analysis too, with clever skill in order to produce great tragic effects. For instance, see how she pictures Adam's mental sky, bright and clear, just as the worst storms are about to break. In picturing his mental state on the morning of the trial, she shows us again a "brave active man, who would have hastened toward any danger or toil to rescue others from an apprehended wrong or misfortune," but one who feels "powerless to contemplate irremediable evil and suffering."

In the study of Lydgate, however, we find the author developing his character largely and with the greatest effect, by her analysis of his mental state. Here we see character unfolding gradually as the master mind works out her plan. The outcome of the story—the shipwrecking of Lydgate's hopes—is a disappointment to us, but we do not question the author's power of analyzing mental states. Frequent evidence of this power is shown in chapter XI, where we find every hope, every aspiration, that influences our character, portrayed in bold lines whose trend is clear and definite. Here, we recognize the elements of Lydgate's strength, energy, ambition, and strong will; here, too, we see the first fruits of his impulsiveness. The author uses this method of analysis to show the true sadness of his life's tragedy, and to give us the best conception of his character.

The author's philosophy of life crops out frequently in her treatment of Lydgate's character. She uses this philosophy, sometimes to emphasize a trait of character; more often, however, she uses it to advance the plot, as for example, in the passage: "when a man has seen the woman whom he would have chose if he had intended to marry speedily, his remaining bachelor will usually depend on her resolution rather than on his." We enjoy these sage and witty observations of the author, but she rarely uses them to develop character directly.

The author makes this philosophy of life more prominent in "Adam Bede," than in "Middlemarch; at least in so far as it concerns Adam and Eve. Besides helping in the advancement of the plot, and the portrayal of character, the author's philosophy of life in "Adam Bede" points out the inescapable, ethical law, whose breaking brings certain inevitable consequences. The author shows us by this method, too, how it may be possible for a sensible man like Adam to fall in love with a vain, little coquette like Hetty, when she asks: "Is it my weakness, pray, to be wrought on by exquisite music?"

If not, then neither is it a weakness to be so wrought upon by the exquisite curves of a woman's cheek and neck and arms, by the liquid depths of her searching eyes, or the sweet childish point of her lips. The author explains, too, why Adam, usually so resolute and determined, hesitates as he goes to receive Dinah's final answer, by telling us that "On the verge of a decision we all tumble: hope pauses with fluttering wings."

A general deduction can hardly be made here, since we have studied character development in the two novels only. Conversation—it should not be a mere discussion nor a scientific lecture—seems, however, to be the best single means of developing a lifelike

\[ \text{footnote: pp. 110, 227, 231, 283, 306.} \]
character. Actions and personal description are of great importance in emphasizing such a character, and require less space, too, than any of the other methods. The impressions of others give, sometimes, a clear, definite picture; but usually they take up more space than their importance justifies. Of the methods of examination, thought narrative seems to give the most realistic effect. The other methods of examination, if used sparingly, lend a charm to this effect. A largeness of analysis, on the contrary, tends to make a character shadowy and unreal, rather than lifelike.

By a well-balanced use of the different methods of character drawing, George Eliot leaves with us a vivid impression of Adam Bede. But the predominance of certain methods of examination in her portrayal of Lydgate's character, makes his image shadowy. If we were to meet Adam, we should know him, and should greet him cordially. Lydgate, on the other hand, we should pass with a distant bow. The author tells us a great deal about Lydgate, but she gives us only a formal introduction to the man himself. She brings Adam, however, into our own circle. We meet with him, we see the color of his hair; we recognize his voice; and we share in his sorrow.
II.

Dinah and Dorothea.

A study of character development in "Adam Bede" and "Middlemarch" would not be complete without some reference to Dinah Morris and Dorothea Brooke. Dinah, although having a minor part in the true plot of "Adam Bede," is, nevertheless, a strongly drawn, and really lovable character; and Dorothea is not only the leading character in one of the main plots of "Middlemarch," but, in many respects, she is also, the strongest and most pleasing character of the entire novel.

If now we examine our space estimates, we see a marked difference in the methods by which the author has developed the two characters. She has devoted a much greater amount of space to a portrayal of Dorothea's character, than is given to that of Dinah, and yet the latter character seems to me to be as clear and definite as that of the "Middlemarch" heroine. How is it, then, that the author gains such a result?

Our tables show that the author gives 55% of the whole amount of space set apart for Dorothea to her methods of examination or analysis of her inner feelings. This leaves, therefore, a much smaller part for conversation, actions, and description of personal appearance. These three divisions, on the other hand, receive in the case of Dinah, more than 75% of the space given to her character, while less than 15% is given to all the methods of examination combined.

These figures seem to bear out the result already noted in our study of Lydgate and Adam; that is, that methods of examination do not give us clear and definite pictures of the physical character, but that they have to do more directly with the moral and intellectual nature, and with plot advancement.

This it is that the author pictures Dorothea, absorbed in her own thoughts, musing over the past, or dreaming of the future; but this brooding abstraction does not reveal clearly her character. Dinah, however, attracts our attention, and holds our sympathy through her actions and conversation. The author shows by the long dialogue with Mr. Irwin, that Dinah talks freely and without painful, self-consciousness. She makes Dinah's actions, too, show the uniformly kind and self-scrupulous nature of the "pretty preacher woman." The author gives a little larger percentage of space to the actions of Dorothea, but the effect on her character is not to make it more definite.

The conversation and personal appearance of Dinah receive much more attention from the author than she gives to the same methods in Dorothea's case: the approximate percentages follow: 56% to Dinah's conversation, 23% to Dorothea's; 67% to Dinah's personal appearance, 27% to Dorothea's. The larger amount of space given to the development of Dinah's character by these two methods leaves us a more lifelike image of Dinah herself.

In the development of Dorothea's character, the author devotes nearly 10% of space to thought narrative, 13% to author's comment, and 25% to analysis of mental state; while in Dinah's case less than 15% of space is given to all methods of examination combined. By devoting so much more space to methods of examination, in the drawing of her character, the author gives us an intimate knowledge of Dorothea's motives and mental state, but not a well-defined idea of the material being. By these methods the author shows that Dorothea is not a weak character, that she is ruled by strong impulses and a desire to do good in the world, and that an element of her worship in her nature is the one weak spot in her character.
Hetty Sorrel and Rosamond D'Arcy represent characters of an entirely different type from the character of either Dinah or Dorotha. In comparing the two characters we shall find many points in common; but the similarity has not always been produced by the same methods of character development. At the same time, George Eliot gives to each character the same measure of selfishness and heartless coquetry.

The author has been very successful in her treatment of the simple, childish life of Hetty. She paints her character with a few direct strokes and some bright colors. More space, proportionately, is given to methods of examination in the portrayal of her character, than in that of Rosamond. Over 55% of the amount of space given to Hetty is used in methods of examination, while only about 48% is thus used in the case of Rosamond. The greatest difference in the amounts of space used by any one method of character development is in that of conversation. The author gives 8% to Hetty's conversation, and nearly 28% to Rosamond's. Hetty seldom talks, answering questions by a simple yes or no. The author has made the very brevity of Hetty's speeches emphasize the shallowness of her nature, which is revealed so cleverly in her actions. In actions, however, receive nearly double the attention given to her conversation. The author uses actions very largely to bring out the childlike vanity and naïveté in Kitty's nature. She completes the picture of Kitty by the careful analysis of Kitty's mental state, to which she devotes much the largest amount of time and space. In her use of such analysis in the development of a character like Kitty's, George Eliot is remarkably successful. She gives a relatively large proportion of space to the impressions of others as to the character of Kitty, but these impressions are so at variance that they, in themselves, have little value in the development of Kitty's character. The other methods of character development are also used to some extent in this case, but they produce no strong effects, and do not merit a study in detail.

Rosamond, unlike Kitty, talks easily; consequently, in her case, the author uses conversation as one of the principal means of character drawing. The cold, almost heartless nature of the woman comes to the surface in some of Rosamond's polite and decorous speeches. The author uses the fastidious propriety of speech, upon which Rosamond prides herself, to show us a true picture of the selfish, self-willed woman. In analyzing the mental state of Rosamond, the author makes these traits still more prominent. She uses this method freely and exceptionally well. More than one-third of all the space given to Rosamond is taken up by this analysis. Yet our impressions of her character depend entirely on the analysis and conversation. The other methods of character drawing are used even less often here, than in the development of Betty's character. Almost no attention is given to thought, narrative, personal description, and author's comment. Next to the two methods of conversation and analysis, the impressions of others receive the most space, but the author does not gain a definite effect from the use of these impressions. They make us feel that Rosamond is a very pretty woman, but just how she looks, we do not know. The author does, however, create a definite effect in the use of actions. Only a small amount of space is given to the actions of Rosamond, slightly more than half the amount given to Betty's actions; and yet the author makes these actions emphasize most strongly, the traits of character brought out in Rosamond's conversation.

In closing our comparison of the two characters, therefore, we are forced to include actions among the effective means of character drawing. Conversation, and actions of the character, together with the author's analysis of mental state, give us the best conception of the two characters. Betty seldom speaks at any length, but she acts almost unconsciously; Rosamond talks freely, and acts consciously. On the whole, however, conservation and actions are very nearly equalized, and the definiteness of effect in each case is practically the same, although in neither character do we get a definite image of the physi-at being.
Casambo, Ladislaw, and Ethel.

Ladislaw and Arthur, as George Eliot represents them, have little in common with the glowing Casambo. The author has slight sympathy for the character of Casambo, and she paints it with little color and true feeling. She makes Ladislaw, on the contrary, a very pleasing and attractive individual. The character of Arthur, however, requires still greater skill in the portrayal, but she succeeds in making the erring man not altogether despicable.

The author introduces Casambo to us when she gives the general impression of him as to his character. She tells us that he is noted in the county as a man of "profound learning, understood for many years to be engaged on a great work concerning religious history; also as a man of wealth enough to give lustre to his piety." She tells us, too, that Dorothea feels "some wakening expectation" about him. When he finally appears at the Strand, the author gives us two impressions of his character: the one in Celia's remark, "How very ugly
Mr. Casaubon is!; the other in Dorothea's reply, 'I am one of the most distinguished-looking men I ever saw.' The author leads us to accept Eliza's unfavorable impression of him. In no other character in "Middlemarch," or in "Adam Bede," does the author use the impressions of others as to a character with such good effect, as here, in the case of Casaubon. She strengthens our dislike of his character, too, when she reveals, through his pompous and pedantic conversation, the marked egotism of the faded clergyman! She changes our dislike to disgust, when she shows in his cold, lifeless letter to Dorothea, the vanity, the conceit, the presumption of the man. By her analysis of his mental state, the author explains the falconry which makes him insult Dibdibbin and cast serious reflections on the faithfulness of his wife. This method of analysis, and the two already given—conversation and impressions of others—are used by the author, almost exclusively, in the portrayal of Casaubon's character. With these three methods, she produces a strong artistic effect, but not a lovable character. We are glad that she pays so little attention to Casaubon; we are sorry that Dorothea's life is linked so closely to his; and we see the grave closing over him, without compassion and without regret.

Ladislaw and Arthur, on the contrary, hold our interest and arouse our sympathy. The methods used by the author in developing their characters are almost identical. From 30% to 30% of the amount of space given to each character is taken up by conversation. A small amount only is given to actions, to descriptions of personal appearance, to thoughts, narrative, and to comment by the author. The largest amount of space in both cases is given to analysis of the mental state of the character. Nearly one half of the space given to Arthur is devoted to this analysis, and a little more than one fourth is used in analyzing the mental state of Ladislaw.

The author describes minutely the feelings of Ladislaw toward Casandra and toward Brother. By this method of analysis, he reveals the weakness and the strength of Ladislaw. He shows an element of unrest in his nature, combined with a newly awakened sense of pride and independence. He brings out, too, in this way, his charming disposition and delicate sense of honor. These same traits, she emphasizes by means of his own conversation.
The author gives us our conception of Radislao's character largely by the use of conversation and analysis of mental condition. Besides these two methods, she uses actions of the character and impressions of others to develop his individuality. She uses the impressions of others somewhat freely, devoting nearly 80% of the space given to Radislao, to this method. The amount of space used in this way, however, seems extravagant, when we examine the effect produced. The author makes no traits stand out prominently by this method, and even those traits partly revealed by impressions are brought out more strongly by conversation and examination of mental state. She gives about 20% of space to the actions of Radislao, but these actions simply enforce, and make more lifelike, his character as portrayed by the other methods.

As already shown, the author describes at great length Arthur's mental state. She shows the conflicting emotions that torture his mind. She tells us that he resolves not to take any more notice of Kitty, that, to carry out this resolution, he gallops to Norbury to lunch with Sommerville, and then that he rides madly back to the Chase for feared he would meet with the charming little maid. In the description of his mental state, the author reveals all that we know of Arthur's character. Conversation, the only other method used to any extent, merely adds color to this picture. The author, in this way, presents first, a thoughtless, but generous and affectionate man who means well, but who is too weak to resist the temptation that comes to him; and then, after his fall, she shows us the same man transformed by suffering, struggling nobly to make all the reparation in his power.

The author develops the character of Ladislaw in much the same way that she does Arthur's, but the element of uncertainty in the former has no place in the latter. She seems to place Arthur under the influence of an unseen power, that drives him on with irresistible and relentless energy, in a fixed and unalterable course; but she makes no feel that Ladislaw, on the other hand, might have remained in Rome, or might, even after Casaubon's death, have gone away, forever, from Middlemarch and Dorothea.
Conclusions.

In concluding, now, our comparison of the technique of the two novels, we shall note briefly the author’s treatment of some of the minor characters and incidents, and then call attention once again to the more striking features of her technique.

Mrs. Eyre and Mrs. Cadwallader are both women of marked characteristics, and these characteristics the author reveals by a large use of conversation, accented by energetic actions and author’s comment. By this method she makes the character of Mrs. Eyre, although but little space is given to its portrayal, stand out bright and clear. In the same way she gives us a clever picture of Mr. Brooke.

Mr. Bulstrode, on the other hand, the author does not picture as clearly as an individual, but by the use of analysis and comment, she makes us appreciate fully his life’s tragedy.

In ‘Middlemarch’ as in ‘Adam Bede’, Mrs. Eliot seems to take a peculiar delight in presenting to us an old-fashioned country clergyman. In this way, the author shows her subtle skill in the portrayal of character. At the same time, she uses Mr. Irwin and Mrs. Farnbrother who are confidants of her leading characters, as unconscious instruments in her hands; for the projection of plot lines. Her interest in the two however, leads her away, sometimes, from more vital characters. Again in both novels, when Mrs. Orgreave has her say out, and when Regley insults Mr. Brooke, the author shows her tendency to digress, and to ridicule galling customs.

Another fault, according to principles laid down by theorists, frequently mars the artistic effect of the author’s work in “Middlemarch,” and comes out, here and there, in “Adam Bede.” She seems unwilling to allow incidents to come out naturally through the medium of the characters themselves, for she constantly intervenes with comment, making her own personality too prominent.

In general, the author uses analysis and examination to advance plot interests, and to reveal the workings of conscience and the mind. Arthur and Hetty who offend against ethical law, Lydgate, and Dorothea are characters developed largely by methods of analysis. When, however, the author uses conversation, actions, and personal description, freely, she succeeds in drawing more natural and lifelike characters. Her greatest success in the use of this mode of character development is in “Adam Bede.”

1 “Adam Bede” pp. 61, 163; “Middlemarch” p. 150.
2 P. 307. 3 P. 356. 4 P. 126, 581. 5 P. 187.
The desire to analyze and to comment seems, however, to grow upon George Eliot, and just as this desire increases, the unity and coherence of her novels decrease. In "Middlemarch"—her later work—she does not keep to one plot; she grows less careful with her diction; she does not foreshadow the future; and she seems undecided as to the fate of her characters. In "Adam Bede," on the other hand, there is no uncertainty, no counterplot; the characters are well defined from the beginning; the outcome is distinctly foreshadowed; and the fate of the characters, prophesied. Critics differ as to which novel is the more artistic. From a rhetorical standpoint, however, "Adam Bede" seems to have a more perfect finish. "Middlemarch" is a strong psychological work; "Adam Bede" touches the heart. "Middlemarch" is rambling and discursive, but "Adam Bede" displays almost faultless unity.

"Adam Bede" published 1859; "Middlemarch," 1872.

p. 410; also p. 77.