INTRODUCTION

FIVE YEARS have passed since the Poetry Society of the University of Illinois published its first volume, Illini Poetry—1918-1923. That volume was a pioneer among collections of university poetry, and the success which it achieved fully justified the courage and rewarded the labor, which was great, of Professor Bruce Weirick in editing it. For some years now the edition has been exhausted, and the book is permanently out of print.

In coming before the public for the second time the Poetry Society stands less in need of introduction. Those who are familiar with the older book will recognize some of the authors in the new, we hope with pleasure; and we have no doubt that they will regret the absence of others. Still there would be little excuse for publishing this book were it not for the new names which here bear witness to the fact that the Poetry Society is a living institution. Changing gradually as the classes come and go, it has continued during the past five years to hold its fortnightly meetings at which the poems are read and discussed.

What change there has been in the nature of the poetry during the last five years may best be left to others to point out. The long poems which distinguish this volume from the former one represent the prize poems during the period. One cannot, I think, fail to note the increased number of poems of classical inspiration. What this means I do not know, but I cannot but deem it a heartening sign that in this day the poetry of a state university may have an academic flavor.

If our book find favor, we shall be greatly pleased; at any rate there was great fun at its making.

SONGS FROM THE DEATH OF KUBLA

I.

"We are the princes of Asia,
Sons of the snow and the stars,
Born to the horse like the centaurs of old,
Flashing our bright scimitars
Edged with a frost that is bitter and cold
And fresh from the fashioning of scars.

We are the Tartars of Baikal,
Gods of the lakes and plains.
We ruled the north when the planets were young.
Brood of the winds and the rains,
Flinging our lances where lightning is flung
Out beyond Heaven's domains.

We are the Lords of Kerulun,
Wielding the might of the Pole,
Shoeing our steeds with the curse of the North,
Clasping its soul to our soul
And riding like devils from Hell, issue forth
To claim the whole world for our toll."

II.

"The singing arrow of Tartary flies,
Flies through the dark and the mist

[1]
And the soul of a foeman ascends to the skies
At the single turn of the wrist.
The bleeding soul of a man, who dies
At the turn of a Tartar wrist.

We have notched our shafts with a Tartary song,
Death in the dark and the mist,
And they speed through the night with the bite of the thong
And the single turn of the wrist.
For life is weak and death is strong
At the turn of a Tartar wrist.

We have carried the fear of the Tartary hordes,
Hordes of the dark and the mist,
With the burning brand and the flaming swords
And the single turn of the wrist.
And all the north proclaims us lords
At the turn of a Tartar wrist.

So ride where ye will my Tartary men,
Sons of the dark and the mist,
For your strength is more than the strength of ten
At the single turn of the wrist.
And we can conquer the north again
At the turn of a Tartar wrist.”

Three Old Men

Scene: The camp of Heber in the early evening. To the left tents and a fire around which the three old men sit. To the right the tent of Heber. The stars are out and the new moon hangs low in the skies.

First Old Man

The pinions of the night are low and black.
The moon is blue among the star-washed rack;
Blue as a babe breath stricken at its birth;
Blue as the sea that laves the haggard earth.
Comrades, these signs portend some fearful ill. . . .
See how the witch fires dance among the hills!

ILLINI POETRY

Second Old Man
(Indicating the Third Old Man)
Our fellow nods; his star is nearly set
Upon the dome of God's dark minaret.

First Old Man
He sleeps and with his alabaster hands
Clings to what little life he yet commands,
As the green fingers of the waving palm
Cling to a sunbeam when the day is done.

Second Old Man
The desert is a ghastly place to die. . .
The sand, the sun, the brazen strip of sky.
Give me white music and the fragrant vine
To stir my sluggish veins like magic wine
Or let me die in some old garden rare,
Where silver lilies beckon in the air
And the cool azure of the towering skies
Is spangled with the wings of butterflies.
'Tis sweet to die where dreaming fountains play;
To close one's eyes upon the calm of day
And conn the dulcet measures of the lute,
Muting the roaring sphere till all is mute.

[4]
Illini Poetry

Third Old Man

(Muttering in his sleep)

Today, when I poured wine upon your grave;
I heard a voice and saw the iris wave;
A silver moth arose and turned and fell
To tell me that your spirit feasted well.

First Old Man

Hear that? He speaks to one within the tomb;
The fingers of the night are stained with doom;
The dogs of Hell are coursing through the clouds
And claws of bone are tearing at their shrouds;
For graves are op'ed and spirits walk abroad,
Something has fired the anger of a god.

Heber

How base becomes the heart of man grown old,
Just reason flees and haunting fears take hold.
Strong arms that once were foremost in the fray
Now falter as they raise their hands to pray.
The night is fair and graves are not agape
Nor do the clouds assume unwonted shape;
For the great Bull of Canaan rules with might
And makes my star ascendant of the night.

[5]
ILLINI POETRY

Third Old Man
(Muttering in his sleep)
The Bull has torn the cloud-tops with his horns
And the proud king of Hazor sits and mourns.

First Old Man

Old men dream deep.

Heber
And falsely too, I deem.
Tonight the vultures sweep o’er Kishon’s stream,
Where all the flower of Israel lies dead;
In Canaan’s camp they toy with Barak’s head
And spin a song about his ruddy beard,
The Bull is strong and ever to be feared.
To-morrow I shall sit by Jabin’s seat
And drink his wine and taste his fragrant meat,
Watching the women of Naptali dance,
The lovely captives of his mighty lance.
Lo, I have sworn an oath on Jabin’s blade
And touched the sacred Talisman of jade;
Now as a sign that peace between us bides
I take his daughter Jael to be my bride.
First Old Man

The supple mare soon steals the stallion's fire
And courage bends the knee to fierce desire.

Heber

The golden stars that wander through the night
Find 'neath her brow, themselves in flesh bedight,
Half-curtained by dark tapestries of blue.
And huddled lilies nurtured by the dew
Are shamed by the pale beauty of her breast.
The haughty rose that sways on Sharen's crest
And all the crimson vintage of the south
Are wan before the crescent of her mouth.

Second Old Man

Yea once the desert blossomed like a rose;
Whither has fled its perfume no one knows.
Love is a ball of crystal, through its glass,
Man sees not that the things of beauty pass
And learns not to his ultimate dismay,
That high sprung passion lives but for a day.

(Enter a messenger)

Messenger

Like a faint dove before a hawk I come
Flying the roll of Barak's victorious drum.

The beast of Canaan gasps upon the field
And Sisera beats upon his brazen shield,
But no man comes, for horse and rider flee,
The rest drift southward to the curling sea.

Heber
Man, you are mad; no hand can e’er avail
Against the Bull and all the priests of Baal.

Messenger
No human hand perchance, this stranger god
Fights with the lightning and thunderous rod,
And pours the darts of Heaven on your head.
Armies of heroes rise where’er he treads
With burning spears and javelins of flame;
The raging storm winds chant his wondrous name.
Against such might a blade of steel is vain.
To trust in arms upon a fire-swept plain
Or challenge trumpets with the whirling sand
Is more than mortal valour can demand.

Heber
Dark visaged man, cursed harbinger of woe,
Blood spattered clown in fortune’s magic show,
ILLINI POETRY

Hide your base brow in some black ocean's stream,
For I would sink to sleep again and dream.

Messenger

I go my lord to Hazor's blighted gates,
Where on his throne the ill-starred monarch waits.

Heber

Arise, old men, we ride to join the fray,
A sudden thrust may save a fatal day,
These desert men ere now have drunken deep
And victory is an easy charm to sleep.

(Enter Jael)

My lord this tumult 'roused me from my bed,
Your cheeks are pale, your eyes are filled with dread.
What fearful thing has made your lips so white?

Heber

All things are well, 'tis but the winds of night,
That are so chill after the heat of noon.
We ride upon the merchants of Samsun,
Who urge their camels forward hurriedly

[9]
ILLINI POETRY

In hope that by the sun they'll reach the sea.
Soon you'll have silver bracelets for your arms
And great eyed pearls and tiny ivory charms
Such as the women of the Ganges wear
To prove the grotesque blackness of their hair.
Now we must go, the hour brooks no delay
If we shall down our quarry by the day.

(Exit all but Jael)

Jael

Such has become the fate of Hazor's maid
To wed this prince of desert renegades,
To share his bed and whelp his hawk-like brood
And rule with him the realm of solitude.
Where was my lover when this deed was done?
Where was the King of Oran's august son?
The noble Sisera, captain of the host,
Who feared not god nor demon, man nor ghost.
Why came he not to soothe my rising fears
And kiss away the torrent of my tears?
Lo, life is dumb, her singing radiance
Is stilled like some lost movement of the dance,
And the calm march of never-ending time
Is but a faintly shadowed pantomime.
But hope once blazing never will grow cold,
He yet may come in chariot of gold

[10]
And with a gesture spare me from my doom. . . .
The hand of Fate weaves softly on my loom.
(Enter Sisera, who stops out of sight)
Life is a fragile bush to which we cling
As dangling o’er the pit of doom we swing,
The pit wherein red-eyed and mouth agape
Fierce Death lies waiting in a dragon’s shape
To claim us when our tired fingers sleep.
Around the bushes now two strange mice creep
And at its ancient stem caught in the clay
The black mouse gnaws at night, the white by day.
But still we cling and fear to lose our hold,
Because the sky is sometimes tinged with gold
And oft the dew upon the bush is rare
A lethal potion for our grave despair.
Why should we not our puny hopes dismiss
And let ourselves sink to that cold abyss?

_Sisera_

Because the sky is sometimes tinged with gold
And oft the dew upon the bush is rare.

_Jael_

There was a time that voice would make me whole
And fling its music through my trembling soul;

But now it fills my heart with sudden fears
Can it be but the echo of the years,
That were so fair, when nights were strangely white
And every hour brought a new delight.
'Tis but a demon sent to vex my brain!
Away cold ghost! But hearken, once again,
Perhaps he floats in Kishon's awful tide
And now his soul has hastened to my side.

Sisera

Fairest of Hazor, raise your downcast eyes;
The moon still triumphs in the star-spun skies
And Spring comes on more glorious and true
Than any that two lovers ever knew.

Jael

Your lips, my lord, are sweet, your words are fire,
That kindle in my bosom deep desire.
I feared you dead, a victim of the fray,
Deaf to my cries and blind and cold and gray.

Sisera

I would that I were stretched beneath the stars
Bereft of breath and torn with bitter scars,
ILLINI POETRY

Toy of the winds and victim of the sun,
Plodding again that road, to where all Life begun.

Jael

You lost the day; you fled before the foe,
Say that I lie, I can’t believe it so.

Sisera

Your words are true, true as the course of time,
True as the gods eternal and sublime.
The Bull of Canaan fell before the wrath
Of Israel’s god and all the men of Gath.
Lie writhing on that terror-smitten plain,
Slaves to their fears and martyrs to their pain.

Jael

The gods are false and those who trust them find
Words for the dumb and beauty for the blind.
Find faith in arms and in a war-like glance,
Fight like a man and leave the rest to chance.
’Tis better to have fought and bravely died,
Than fled devoid of honor and of pride.

Sisera

Reproach me not, beloved, for my flight;
I love the moon and all the flame of night;

I love the sun and all the roses sweet,
The crimson dove and rubied parrakeet.
Lo, I am young, not weighted down with age,
My days would hardly fill a single page
Of time's great book, wide written though it be.
I still would watch the shadows on the sea.
The clouds that crown the distant mountain's head
Are soft and white. 'Tis ghastly to be dead
And lapped among the clay 'till you are naught
But some faint memory that an odd word brought.
Chide men not love, we live so short a while
And men are cruel and cold and full of guile.
Come, I would live a year, a day, an hour;
To see the hillsides once again in flower
And hear the silver voices of the Spring
And then I'll gladly pay my reckoning.

Jael
There is a graver song than Beauty's song,
A chant more noble, eloquent and strong,
That bade our fathers pledge themselves to Death;
Forsake this sphere and fly where Ashtoreth
Presides among the councils of the blest
In that far realm that lies beyond the west.
The sun must lose his rays in Duty's beams
And stars must fade like ever fickle dreams,
When Honour holds the warrior to obey.
When Valour calls, there is no other way,
The road is open and the vista clear
Portrays a conqueror's pomp or hero's bier.

Sisera
Your lips are quite unfitted for such words
Dressed in full armor, like a man who girds
A breastplate on, when robed in white attire
To worship Peace and tend her altar fire.
I can forget the war, its mad emprise
Beneath the calm caresses of your eyes
And all the battled hopes of alien lands
Are naught before the whiteness of your hands.

Jael
I am the daughter of a chieftain old,
Born to the purple and bred to the gold;
But this I remember, remember for ages:
The hand that writes swiftly on History's pages
Records but the valiant, the high and the just
The deeds of the lover are flung with his dust.

Sisera
The day is done, my coward's name is made.
Could I but claim an hour from the shade
Of time long past, I would renew my fame
Or die, but not in misery and shame.

Jael
You yet can die and win a hero’s grave,
Be called the wise, the noble and the brave.
The gate of Death will gladly open wide,
The key is sheathed in bronze against your side.

Sisera
I cannot die that way, my hand is weak,
My heart is weaker too, if it could speak
What fragrant words would issue from my lips,
Sweeter than nectar that forever drips
From out the scented lily’s honied store.
Talk not of Death when Love’s majestic shore
Is just ahead and we are very young
Not half our gallant days are yet unstrung
From Life’s sweet cord. Let us arise and go
To some far place where none will ever know
Our plight and why we came and who we are;
’Tis better than if I from this cymar
Snatched forth a knife and sunk it to my heart.
Let us arise, give up, and hand in hand depart.

Jael
I could not love thee in a coward’s dress
Though housed in some far land’s forgetfulness.

[ 16 ]
I love not thee as man but as all men,
The final one, a creature cast of ten.
Take up your dagger, seal your brow to Fate.
Death comes at last, 'tis better soon than late;
Your perished name, resplendent, calm and white
I then can cherish 'til eternal night.

Sisera
Press me not closely, sweet, my strength doth wane,
And all your subtle reasoning would be vain
To turn me to your will, strong though it be.
I chose not death, but Life and Love and thee.
Come, I would sleep encushioned in your breast
Lulled by your voice and by your hands caressed,
Until my cares drop from me like a glove
And I am garbed alone within your love.

The lights fade slowly and the two figures can scarcely be discerned. From a distance comes the beat of a tocsin and the chant of Deborah comes at regular intervals.

Chorus
March on, my soul, march on in triumph proud,
Hurl high thy blade; begin thy song of praise;
Place thy feet firmly on the highest cloud
And raise the chant of our most glorious days.
Arise ye heavenly hosts and chorus loud,
God in the highest, to Him eternal praise!

The Kings came forth with chariots of flame
Dressed in bright armor, crowned with scarlet bays;
Megiddo's crystal waters soon became
A reddened asp that groans before it slays.
Sons of the morning, lift up your shouts, proclaim
God in the highest, to Him eternal praise!

March on, my soul, march on, the stars on high
Fought in their courses, shed their fiery rays
Against that Prince of Canaan all the sky
Turned back its blue and showed its awful grays.
Ye choirs of angels raise the victor's cry,
God in the highest, to Him eternal praise!

The lights come up slowly during the last verse and Jael is discovered standing with Sisera prone at her feet. The chant ceases for the moment.

Jael
My life is done, my love is crushed and dead
Flung through the brow of that celestial head,
That lies forgetful of the things that are
The Spring, the sun, the evening's newest star.
Moons will look down and roses nod and pass,
Rain after rain will mingle with the grass;
But he is gone, and time and space are naught.
What man he was and all the things he wrought
Are secret now, locked in my bosom deep.
This thing I hold and shall forever keep,
That he was brave, and loved and died a man.
I will arise, return unto my clan
And mourn for him while I have tears to shed,
For tears are naught but kisses to the dead.

(Exit Jael)

Heber rushing in at the head of his party perceives the body of Sisera.

Heber

Those dogs of Judah. . . . Who is this so cold?
Wearing a prince's helm of triple gold.
Great Lord of Canaan! 'tis thy captain brave
Stretched at my feet in semblance of a slave.
Where is the woman Jael . . . she loved him well.

(Enter Messenger)

Messenger

A thing, my lord, too terrible to tell.
ILLINI POETRY

Heber
Speak! Speak! thou canst not shock my hardened ears
And stammer not, dumb smitten by thy fears.

Messenger
Out of the wastes, with these now maddened eyes,
I saw a wounded bull against the skies
Charge wildly at a figure on the sands;
I knelt and pressed my face against my hands
And when I looked there lay so calm and pale
That flower of women Canaan knew as...

Heber (bowing his head)
Jael!!
The lights sink as Heber drops to his knees
and as the curtain falls slowly the chant begins again.

Chorus
Blessed above all women shall be Jael,
Who dwelt among the desert in the ways,
Whose hand was strong and fitted to the nail
Smote the proud prince as he in slumber stays.
Lift up the chant and never shall it fail
God in the highest, to Him eternal praise!

QUERY
What's the wealth that age loans
To a weathered house—
To old trees with rain-stones
Beaded down the boughs?

Why should time engender
Mystic, mellow, kind
Whispers in the slender
Music of the wind?

Doubtless for the seeing
On the musty shelves
Of extended being
Secrets of ourselves,

Not to be delivered
Till we are, at last,
Shining little shivered
Pieces of the past.

Blanche Bell

WINTER SONG
We've a chair; we've a cup;
We have tea to pour.
Leaves are dead and crumpled up
All around the door.
ILLINI POETRY

We were fickle and unkind
In the sunny weather;
Now the chill is on the wind,
Let us drink together!

Summer's foliage lies, today,
In a musty pile;
We may chase the frost away
For a little while.

We've a chair; we've a cup,
Hot and steaming here.
Who can say what lips may sup
With another year?

Blanche Bell

A GIRL IN THE NIGHT

She laughs: like sweeping wind on fragile strings
The echo trails her untamed mirth, and mark
How firmly the reverberation clings
Far up along the fringes of the dark!

In sunset-stricken streams and wavering wells
Her sultry hair gleams in the mean half-light—
Let her hang clusters of wild silver bells
Between this night and yet another night

ILLINI POETRY

When some sad-hearted woman lies and grieves
As soft as morning light lies on the leaves.

AN AGING WOMAN

How bravely does she hold the gaze of Time,
Who crowds her forward with unfailing feet!
Her youth, that frailly poignant, transient-sweet
Sublime,
Soared like a young bird, sank as shudderingly,—
Lies helpless, caught against the fence of years,
Hung on the old blood-rusted barb of fears,
Frenziedly fluttering her one free wing,
And seeks in vain to sing.

I cannot think that things so wise, so sweet,
Can wither thus, all in a little day—
Married to mould and darkened by decay,
Can sleep content to hear the brittle beat
Of rain above, the cutting of the sleet,
The ripe, impulsive burst of swollen grain,
The fog creep o'er the hills with feathered feet,
And feel no pain.

In some remote exotic tropic wild,
Where waver weird gay-winged things aloft,

[23]
Where bright snakes coil and odorous leaves are piled
In rotting ridges where they fall, storm-strewn,
She shall arise when pale, late winds sing soft,
A rare night-blooming cerus 'gainst the moon.

RONDEAU

Day was dawning, rainy, dark,
When I saw a novel sight
From my window toward the park—
You'd been sitting there all night;
Waiting for me down below,
Soaking wet—but you were yawning.
Never did I hate you so. . . .
Day was dawning.

Charles Bennett

SPRING PLOUGHING

The wind is in the ploughboy's hair today.
Yet often has it sung around his ears.
The cherry blossom blooms upon the spray,
As it has bloomed before; old hopes and fears
Retell from day to day their timeless tale
As freighted Earth dreams ever to the East
"On her soft axel"; ships in passing hail
And vanish; Death still watches at the feast.

[ 24 ]
But now has come a stirring in the air—
The secret, stealing life by ways unguessed
Of sap and blood through every limb and bough;
The ploughboy feels his young strength mounting where
The wind’s firm kiss is on his body pressed
While through the sleeping Earth he drives his plough.

A VILLANELLE OF VALENTINES

Though countless delicate designs
Have weilded charm, no one has writ
A Villanelle of Valentines.

And countless ardent rhythmic lines
Meander with a gracious wit
Through countless delicate designs—

Ah, here a lovely lady pines
For any gentleman who’d fit
A Villanelle of Valentines;

And there a gallant beau reclines
Whose heart his lady’s will not quit
Through countless delicate designs. —
ILLINI POETRY

Still, none of these aright defines—
There's but one thing that measures it—
A Villanelle of Valentines.

For here is all the love that twines,
And all the glistening words that flit
Through countless delicate designs—
A Villanelle of Valentines.

SONNET

How slender now the store of days that went Unreckoned by, and left me solace-bare,
Like burnished notes from out a secret quair,
Their lustre vanished and their splendor spent.
How many days since then do I lament
The perishing of glamour everywhere,
The absent troublous beauty to ensnare
Or vex my thoughts with ardent discontent.

Ah me, is this the end of pleasuring?
Shall one face passing gird me round with grief,
Or one stilled hand put quiet on the earth?
I had not thought to see the sundering
Of joy from fields, or grace from falling leaf,
And other beauty strangely nothing worth.

[ 26 ]
There was no pleasure ever here, I thought, When I first saw his dry astringent face, And marked the brisk precision of his pace Around the cramped room, where the farmers bought His garish stuffs. And surely there was nought Of largeness or of gayness in the place— But such an air as might too well efface With phlegm a small soul insecurely caught.

But six months later, when the greening year Was whelmed in April, I again was there. I thought he had not changed much, till he said By way of greeting, "Well, sir, spring is here. That mist-green field a month ago was bare. And that leaved tree I would have sworn was dead."

QUINCY GUY BURRIS

PLATO—ULTIMATE REALITY

Man calls that Beauty which is snared in roses, And Wisdom what is but a dream of knowing. Music for him is compassed in Pan's blowing A little sound he loves awhile, and loses. Music he hears is not what he supposes. The Real is ageless, and the sensuous glowing

Wherewith man sees is all a flux and going—
Light from a shuttered lamp, that flares and closes.

Plato, we are not builded for the wonder
Of these high summits of untrammeled mind.
We falter on this height, in this thin air,
Where faint the Oracles of Wisdom thunder,
Knowing we are too pitiably blind
To look on Beauty, terrible and bare.

Quincy Guy Burris

SCARS

There is deep serenity in ugly things—
Wood dark with age and scarred with daily wear,
Coarse garments wet with rain, and clumsy mud-stained shoes,
In faces marred with old forgotten care.

They have the strong plain breath of earthiness about them.
Their feel is like the rough black bark of trees,
That stand deep planted in the loam and know untroubled
The crackling storm or sunlit drone of bees.
Illini Poetry

Great souls there are who leap to flaming beauty
In timeless wind-swept realms behind the stars,
But we may know, who walk in homely places,
The intimate serenity of scars.

Garreta Busey

The Sleeping Beauty

Not for the fragile pitcher you let fall
I wept so stormily. But who could guess
That under heaping years there was a hall
Where heroes sat and feasted motionless.

On its wide hearth the great oak logs were crowned
With flames brittle as glass; for mute applause
A silent minstrel sang; a ragged hound
Gnawed his bone hungrily, with frozen jaws.

The pitcher fell, through time, and as it crashed,
The great hall sprang to life; the torches leapt,
The harp was quick with music, metal clashed
And voices rang. Hearing one voice, I wept.

And the great logs, fire-bitten, fell apart
And were consumed, smouldering, in my heart.

VILLANELLE
The Villanelle is my despair.
Its subtle trick eludes me quite.
Still would I please my lady fair.

Her joyous heart is free from care.
Its tripping verse is her delight.
The Villanelle is my despair.

The sun makes bronze gleams in her hair.
In shade her locks are black as night.
Still would I please my lady fair.

I love to see the sunlight there.
She does not know, the happy sprite,
The Villanelle is my despair.

The fairy threads are silken where
The sunshine makes its bronzes bright.
Still would I please my lady fair.

We'll always be a happy pair
If I can make this verse end right.
The Villanelle is my despair.
Still would I please my lady fair.

NO NIGHTINGALE

All day long—
With my eyes on the ground—
I have been thinking of shadows.
What they are.
Just now—across the grass—
A tiny one ran, fluttering.
I would not lift my head.
I would not look up.
"It is not a nightingale"
I thought sullenly,
"It is not a nightingale, nor a lark, nor a thrush,
It is only a sparrow!"
I am so wise.
I know it is the season for sparrows.
But God—I am young.
This ought to be my season
For seeing even the shadows of sparrows
As nightingales!

CLOUDY NIGHT

As a boy with a spoon
Only frets at his pudding and tries to uncover a plum,
So the wind for the moon

[ 31 ]
Slyly fumbles a cloud with a covetous finger and thumb.

Then a swift silver ray,
Like a boy’s uninflected soprano, unsubtle and sweet
Lights two lovers, and they,
As one shadow, sway into the shade, on a shad-owy street.

Marjorie Dooley

TO A YOUNG ORGANIST

It was of you I dreamed
Of you I wove my spinning fantasies,
And on your wavering shadow pinned my heart.
So insecure a rest! How breathlessly
We followed—doubled—danced—my heart and I,
With your unstable shade. And then, at last,
I stamped my foot and snatched my tired heart
And pinned it—where I mean that it shall stay—
Upon the coat-tails of a solid man!

Marjorie Dooley

TIME

There is no rest! No tiniest point of time
To lean our hearts upon. The while we say
ILLINI POETRY

We love, love flows beyond us. Swift away
The lovely instant fades. The rose, the rhyme,
The kiss, the hushed and cool ecstatic breath
Of violets desert each trancéd sense
And leave us empty, lost. No "present tense" Survives our school days. Shall we find that death
Is no more stable? In some glorious hour
What if we cry "we live!" "we live!" and find
Life flowing, flown? And if we say "we die"
Shall Death too pass? Time, sullen, dour,
Is he outreached at last? What if behind
And thru the pilfering moment our lost treasures lie?

MIDNIGHT FANTASY

Cupped dark star-sown sky
over the lake,
curved in the lake.
Stars are as deep as the stars are high,
a hollow ball for a god to take (or a god's child)
to seize and shake till the hot

sputtering wild
stars sink with a hissing sigh
into the lake,
and the fishes fly,
firmly protesting,
into the sky!

NIGHT IS A DARK-HAIRED POET

Night is a dark-haired poet,
And he’s in love with Day.
While the shining Sun that stands between Keeps them apart alway.

Sometimes in the evening twilight,
Sometimes in the morning dew,
While twilight shadows linger long,
They meet, these lovers true.

And folded then in close embrace,
They watch the moments glide
Into Eternity, and for the time
Forget all else beside.

So lingering is this stolen kiss,
One cannot well decide
Which is the dusky lover,
And which the shining bride.

This dusky twilight which we call
Love, or some name as slight,
Is still not light, but lustrous dark,
Not dark, but secret light.

C. H. Dykema

JUNGLE TAILS
I hymn the Hippopotamus, a beast devoid of grace
For when he opens up his mouth, he hasn’t any face.

Observe the plaintive hoppergrass, the insect rates a wreath;
He shows how really tough he is by spitting through his teeth.

Behold the grunting porker; of woe he sips the dregs
When he gets nice and fat he’ll be a half of ham and eggs.

The crayfish is an awkward beast and yet he’s very wise
He travels backward so that sand can’t get into his eyes.

I celebrate the youthful fish, immune from parent’s wrath
No matter how he romps and plays, he doesn’t need a bath.

Behold the wee mosquito, the crazy little clown.
He digs a hole and from it grows a dimple, upside down.

Perceive, I pray, the hobby horse, his head is made of wood
But then he doesn’t give a whoop and wouldn’t if he could.

Observe the hard-boiled saw fish; he’s crazy I suppose
For otherwise why should he wear his teeth upon his nose?

Pray lamp the patient elephant, the hero of this rhyme.
He takes no chance of choking on a peanut at a time.

CONSERVATION
I never yearned to freeze my nose and chase the wily moose,
Such tramps abroad to me seem awfully useless and abstruse.
No moose will ever have a chance to paw the buttons off my pants
Unless the nuts within my dome start slipping and work loose.

Let others decorate their halls with trophies of the chase.
I'll view the antlers with no sign of envy on my face.
I'd rather stalk the simple bat, the sparrow or the neighbor's cat—
I must preserve my talents for the glory of the race.

DAVID V. FELTS

SPRING SOWING
Four figures moving back and forth across
A narrowed hill—two horses and two men;
And all about them earth and air and sky
Filled with a joyous portent. Clouds career
The windy vault of heaven, high and blue.
There is a great to do among the trees,
A twitter and a whistling and a stir;
And where the four have passed birds swoop to glean
The seed that is not swallowed by the soil—
The eager, silent soil pressed by their feet.

Stately and slow like steeds upon a frieze
Move the strong horses, rounding neck and neck.
The seed-box, long, bright red, on yellow wheels,
Is like a toy. "They're much too fat" says man
To man. The other grunts, "What they need now
Is work." And both plod on in silence down
The furrowed field, and drop their seed, and turn,
And one clucks "Gee!" the other flaps the rein,
The seed-box clicks and creaks and swings about,
And up the slope the horses step again.

Four figures stand against the sky that hangs
Over the hill, the house, the barn, and curves
To where the shimmering of sunny air
Disturbs the calm horizon. "It won't rain
Tonight," says one; "they'll be a moon. I guess
That gal will be a-wantin' me to spoon.
I never saw the like . . .” The other spat, “All o’ creation’s warm this time o’ year—Git-op!” The horses rear and bob their heads; Seeds begin dropping to the waiting earth.

Our Overlord
Death is a fine old lord, who keeps a castle;
His serfs we are, keeping his hedges trim—Yet he is kind, for every man, his vassal,
He lets just once come up and sup with him.

Richmond Fowler

Old Thunder
The thunder is old—how old, we know,
Who hear it come tottering over the skies
Crippled and broken and weary and wise;
The thunder knows how to go slow . . . go slow.

Richmond Fowler

The Princeling
Three horsemen rode across the plain.
And wherefore did they ride
Black-cloaked and brooding, through the shadow
Of the mountain-side?

And one was swarth. He spake no word,
    But rode in calmness grim.
And one was pale. He wet his lips,
    And shook in every limb.

And one was such a golden child—
    You'd almost laugh to see
How droll the black cloak looked against
    His rich embroidery.

Three horsemen rode across the plain,
    And crossed the mountains blue—
And when again the sun came up,
    Back on the plain rode two.

PRIDE

They are not proud, who rightfully inherit
    The qualities of true nobility—
They do not even realize their merit,
    Though proud their manner seems, to those who see.

They go unconscious of their regal bearing,
    Not knowing pride in small and jealous things.
Think you the eagle through the heavens faring
    Is proud that he has wings?

BALLADE OF MARCH WINDS

Out of the Caves of Time once more,
    Giant, bat-winged, the March winds go:
High in the darkness they flap and roar—
    Over the house-tops, peaked and low—
    Down in the streets, where to and fro
They bang the shutters of inn and store!
    These are the mad winds! Hear them blow
Where snow but lately went before.

Bat-wings beat on the kitchen door!
    Giants bluster a merry ho!
Drunk with the liquors that freshets pour—
    Quaffing the sap that begins to flow,
    Gaily they roister, and drunker grow!
Brawling and bawling, they pay no score;
    Theirs is wise madness, for they know
Where snow but lately went before.

They that have wrestled with Winter hoar,
    They that achieved his overthrow,
Know that they soon must turn and soar
    Back on wings that grow weak and slow—
    Back to the Caves of Time, although
Now they are strong; so they rollick o’er
    Fields that the peasants soon will sow,
Where snow but lately went before.
ILLSI POETRY

L'envoi:
Giants, before we plant and mow,
   You must sweep clean the earth’s broad floor;
Driving before your wings the snow
   Where snow but lately went before.

GRAMMATICAL ROMANCE
There once was a young preposition,
   And handsome, indeed, was he.
He loved a gay verb of condition,
   And love her infinitively.
She seemed to be in agreement
   With his matrimonial mood;
They quickly decided to cement
   The love with which both were imbued.
The wedding was held, and the function
   Drew all of the very best parts
Of speech, to assist the conjunction
   Of two such reflexive young hearts.
After their grand conjugation
   They went into Woolley’s to live.
Their joy was of high derivation;
   They swore it was intransitive.
But hist! Came a handsome young adverb
   With an indirect object in view—
[42]
He seduced the good verb to a bad verb,
And thus separated the two.

So were the two put asunder,
And split was infinitive glee;
The husband, to everyone's wonder,
Received the sad news passively.

The young preposition explained it:
"I'd got pretty sick of my choice.
My love had been strong, but she strained it
By having too active a voice."

SAINT GREGORY

God gave the good Saint Gregory
The Fisher's seat to hold with power,
And to its pomp of fief and fee
(That even saints keep but an hour)
Joined of most holy poesie
The fragrant and perennial flower.

So in his book we still may read
How Benedict long walked with God
In sanctity of thought and deed,
Keeping the way his Master trod,
Seeking on earth no other meed
Than the thorny crown and scourger's rod.

[ 43 ]
ILLINI POETRY

Learn, too, we may, how once of old
A horse who'd borne the weight of Rome
In no uncertain language told
His mistress he'd not stir from home—
How a good bear brought sheep to fold,
And iron floated light as foam.

So highest truths that faith can teach
Mingling with legends strange and quaint,
That in the peasant's fireside speech
Add to the glory of a saint,
Drew within shortest human reach,
A vision else too far and faint.

The Commonweal

CHATEAUNEUF DU PAPE

No longer on the famed bridge of Avignon
Do youths and maidens dance in happy ring;
No longer up the long streets to the palace
Marching in joyous file the choir boys sing.

No longer hung with cloth of gold and purple
St. Peter's barge rides anchor in the Rhone;
Lonely amid the sad cathedral shadows,
Forever empty waits his Roman throne.

No longer clad in scarlet, sheathed in armor,
Half priest, half soldier, 'mong the men at arms,
Through the rich Comtat rides the cardinal-legate
When out of Languedoc sound war’s alarms.

No Petrarch paces now Avignon’s gardens;
Ruined the cloisters, fallen the lofty spires,
Forgotten now are Aquaviva’s splendors;
On tower and bastion burn no beacon fires.

The saints are broken, effaced the keys of Peter;
The three word lie is painted on the wall
Of many an ancient church and hoary palace,
Tottering through slow years to a final fall.

All perish, church and crenellated casement
Decay beyond renewing; on their crags
The palace and the Fortress of St. Andre
Shall know no more the pride of festal flags.

Of all old pomps and of all ancient riches
But one remains, yet that one holds them all;
At Chateauneuf still grow the papal vineyards
Green in the shadow of the crumbling wall.

The popes are gone, but still the papal vintage
Remains red, rich, and heady as of old,
A wine of fire, of roses, and of velvet,
Meet to be drunk from cups of massive gold.
ILLINI POETRY

In it still live the old Venaissin glories
They come again upon its crimson flood,
Back to Avignon from the realms of legend
While there begins a singing in the blood.

But three full goblets and above the city
Rises the bright sun of the Renaissance,
And the sad chef-lieu of the Vaucluse changing
Becomes the world's shrine and the soul of France.

ON RECEIVING A CIGARETTE BOX OF PINK CARRARA

"It's meant for cigarettes," my Dear, you say?
Cypris forbid that I should answer, "Nay."
Yet though I cherish my tobacco well,
I deck it not with rose and asphodel.
Ah, nicotine is too ethereal
For chest of marble so funereal!

This were, indeed, a resting place more meet
For lifeless pet lost to all dalliance sweet.
Here Lesbia's pampered sparrow might recline,
After his dear day's ultimate decline,
And his light singing soul had winged afar
To those bright fields where birds immortal are,
With that long fable parrot, whose clear voice
Once made Corinna's faithless heart rejoice,
And him whom Statius duæ volucrum named,
Their peer in honor through the ages famed.
Ah one had laid him tenderly away
'Neath wreaths unfading, laurel mixed with bay,
Symbol of song that claimed his latest breath,
And high renown triumphant over death.
In this fair casket wrought of rosy stone
He had not seemed, though pitifully alone
With curled, cold toes and closely folded wings,
Lost to the world of precious, little things.

But ladies' gifts admit of no demur:
My cigarettes must here find sepulchre.
And, after all, in this pink, narrow room
We have no Lesbia's sparrow to entomb.

TRIAD

The trees are gold in the late slant sun.
The leaves are falling, one by one.
We watch the lanes where the shadows run,
    And laugh at the fright they feign.

But beauty fades with the western glow,
And winter strangles these woods we know.

[ 47 ]
The nights have come when the black won't go—
   After the laughter—pain.

A slim dawn pierces the somber sky
And grows to a vivid, eternal cry.
We face the sunrise, you and I,
   And drink of our joy again.

Jon Guenther

SONG FOR A WINTER EVENING

Blue clouds, blue ships,
   Sailing the golden sky,
Winter winds have caught your sails
   And you must hurry by.

Strange clouds, strange ships,
   Pirate ships of the sun,
Buccaneers crowd your rails
   And watch the night come on.

Day dies, blue ships—
   Aye, the dark beats down
To sink you deep in the sea of night
   Ere you can sack the town.

Jon Guenther

[ 48 ]
Locmarioquer, long lost to the voice calling,
Sought forever and aye, and the rain falling
Over the dark hills, and the voice crying
Mournful over the sea, where the gull flying Goes like a gray ghost, and over the mere
Crying comes the lone voice. Locmarioquer,
Never the sun, never the blue and the gold
Sky over the darkness, over the cold
Swamps at sea-edge, rank with the flung spume
Out of the sea. Locmarioquer, the doom!
This the lone sea and the lost land!—
And the questing voice goes, and a great hand
Settles unseen, like a cloud, like a slow breath,
And Death walks in the dark hills—Death
Sings in the rain, looms on the hill’s crest,
Far and shapeless and black in the gray west.
The voice hearing, the voice knowing the fear,
And stealing cold as the mist over the mere
Where the gull flies, the gray ghost winging
Out to sea—and Death on the hill is singing.

Jon Guenther

AS THE SHADOWS ENTER A ROOM
And how shall I presume?—
It was only that you were very near

[ 49 ]
And unforgottably dear
In the swift days, in the inescapable doom
Of that forever unforgettable year.

If only because you came and put forth your hand
And strongly stood at the wheel
Of my ship of most inexorable circumstance,
So that the keel
Swung on the swift tide to the safe land,
I have forgotten the dread sea-gloom
And how it was written that you should go as you came—
As the sun comes, and the sun goes, and the shadows
Enter a room.

Jon Guenther

CHAUCER

Seeing thee pass, we too have laid away
Pale trappings of a wisdom long outworn,
Renounced a muse too wan and cloister-lorn,
To follow thee, impenitently gay.
Now we would learn to know thy brighter day,
To find with thee the full, high bloom of earth,
To rouse the rafters with robustious mirth,
And at thy leaf-blown altar pause to pray.
Aye, for the laughter of full-throated men,
The clink of cups, the swords of heroes drawn,
Linger to monument thy fallen pen,
Linger behind thy pilgrims’ passing on.—
Life and thy smile, through generations gone,—
Death,—and an April song is clear again!
  ROBERT HENDERSON

PALEOLOGUS—1453
Unhappy hour, long night of futile tears,
The knell of Empire rings beneath thy stars.
The torches gutter and the watchfires gleam,
A noise of hosts is on the wakeful plain,
The wind is heavy with an army’s tread,—
An army biding Allah and the dawn.

O lances of the West,—bright, biting steel
Of English swords,—Richard and Vermandois!
O Venice of the waters, Genoa,
Is there no one among thee to fulfill
The promise of thy faith of yesterday?
O Rome imperial, doth Tiber bathe
The feet of one forsworn? O hollow tomb,
That hath been mother of all Christendom!

Thee I loved well, Byzantium, thee I loved
Through all the golden years, the prideful years,
Aye, and through sunset, through the paling hours

[ 51 ]
When thy tear-sparkling laughter gallantly
Bade its adieu to thy declining day.
My sword is thine, Byzantium, and my blood
Is bartered for a moment of thy life,—
Giving thee grace to perish fittingly,
To flaunt thy banners bravely, once again.—
These are for thee, my city. If the heart
That proffers them withhold its fullest zeal,
Think not it loves thee less than very life.
Think only that it yearns to die with thee.
For I am weary of the turmoiled years,
Weary of bitterness and cankered spite,—
Imperial and forlorn, uncomforted,
Yet if thou livest, I must live for thee.

Sancta Sophia, be thy sacred calm
My peace, my refuge and my sepulchre.
Sancta Sophia, be thy solitude
My harbor and my long-abiding place.
Sancta Sophia, be thy lofty groins
My strength of hand, the courage of my soul.
Sancta Sophia, be thy vesper bell
The last, clear purpose of a fallen king.
Be to me now the summons valorous,
Tomorrow be an Empire's requiem!

Enough! The dawn awakes. Brave gentlemen,
Byzantium hath need of thy good swords.
A few we are,—great-hearted, strong of will,—
Once more thy hand, thy smile,—then gallantly
Die with Byzantium, Christ and Constantine!

FALSTAFF RETURNS

Another, yet another,—let me drown
In a vast flagon, spilling its red wine!
Capon and venison, and a comely wench,
And I will jest away the last, long hour.
What matter if the silly candle burn
And gutter yellowly?—if its flame die?—
What matter if chill winter's trumpetings
Beleaguer loud the groaning tavern door?
I am within. What matter if grey ash
Have lain in desolation on its hearth
This score of years?—My wine is plentiful.—
It is a sack will keep me warm, and too,
Methinks there is a glow in memory.

They know not how to live, these mincing mites
Who dine with prudence and who sup with care.
They drink in thimbles, and betimes they feast
In courtliest carouse, politest rout
That ever lusty fellow laughed upon.
Fill up the bowl, good mistress! What?—
Away?—
ILLINI POETRY

Well, filled to myself, and drunk unto mineself,
And bottom to the rafters and the moon!
Yea, I have seen them all,—Peto and Poins,
Gadshill to set a match and take a purse,
Aye, and mad Hal to sing the stars to shame,—

Hal! And 'twas not "His Majesty" who rode Tavern to tavern, inn to merry inn,
And cursed me for a pudding-belted knave,
And bought me wine! Another, mistress,— come—
The candle burneth low, and I would drink
To drown it out.

How, Bardolph, thou?
And doth thy solemn ghost come wandering
To shout the watch with Falstaff? Ho! A bowl
For Bardolph,—and we two shall make
A phantom festival will bring a blush
To puny flesh and blood!—Doth Lucifer
Advantage him of thy bright beacon-flame?
Methinks his brimstone should be paled by it!
Mark you the foolish clock,—he holds his hands
In horror to his face for that he sees
What hath not been these many, dreary years.
"And ghosts, too!" saith he,—aye, and spirits
hale
As ever this old tavern saw alive!
The night is fleet, Bardolph, the candle dims,
And flickers on the dust and mould’ring wall,
And makes the mocking shadows leap at us
To catch us in their all-enshrouding black.
The muffled bell of midnight tolls, the wind
Summons beyond the shutter mournfully,
And knocks like some cold courier of the realm
Of Asphodel and darkness.—Once again,
Or ere the dying hour be told away,—
Roundly we lived, and sith we live again,
Let us as roundly die! A gasping flame
Still flickers. Drain thy flagon! Let a song
Go roaring out to greet the fiends! Once more
A long, long drink,—then leave us yet a breath
To puff the futile candle ere his time!

Robert Henderson

THE CAPTAIN OF THE GUARD
(Rouen—1431)
This girl will bear a watch—the first of you
Napping beside the door, will find his rest
Not to his liking.—I’m for the kitchen fire.
I like not pacing past a witch’s door,
And shivering with something more than cold;
So if some bloodless ghost come rescue-bent
Stab steel into the flesh that is no flesh,
And say that she will join him with the dawn.
God save you from the fiend! I'll drink him off!

There was a time I would have set that stake,
And thought it nothing strange to touch the fire,
And see flames forking upward, as they were
Red devil hands, impatient for their prey.
A man is but a man,—why there you sit,
I cut you down,—the world fares none the worse,—
More bread to fill the others,—one less rogue
To rob the peasants when the wars are done
And no great weeping for you, — but a woman!—
The more fool she, to hear her own hens cluck-
ing,
And think them holy voices!—Well, she'll burn.
I'd set the fire were she ten thousand witches.
Or one poor girl.—I have a debt in heaven;—
At dawn I'll send good payment coiling up
To be a candle for my soul's reward!
Witches must burn!

And yet, I do not like it.
She prays too much, and hers is not the prayer
Of one who dies in agony and shame.
She begs no mercy for such loathesome sin

[ 56 ]
As that she dies for. Once in the night she wept
A very little, "Give me of thy strength!"
And said, "Only forgive that ever I
Should falter. Pity me! Didst not thy heart
Tell thee but once that life was sweet?—not once?
But had thine eyes seen France? Alas, thy sight
Was fixed on heaven, mine on the grass-green hills!"

Call that a witch's prayer! Yes, I have stood
A-tremble by the grating of her door,
Waiting to hear some chanting sorcery,
Or see hell's lightning shiver through the wall,—
And I have heard one tired and lonely girl,
Who stood there, gazing up beyond the stars,
Begging some saint that he should not forsake her,
As if he were, indeed, the king of France!
Aye! And if that same puny king were here
And she on his high seat, it were more fitting!
Why I would send him screaming up to God
In a royal blaze, and speed him there with curses!
Witchcraft, forsooth! What woman's not a witch?

ILLINI POETRY

I take her food you would not give your hounds,
And she will smile such thanks that I could weep
For very rage, fall down and beg her grace!
I say no word, but bang the bolts in place,
And that tremendous loud!

Another bowl!
More wine to thick the blood—the night is cold—
Mark you—when men are brave, they let them fight.
They call a woman witch, and truss her up,
And roast her for the glory of the Lord!
I know not what the will of heaven be,
I am not one to mock at holiness,
But if these noble kings, these bald-pate priests
Who drone their masses with their tongues in cheek
Had seen what I have seen—had watched that girl,
Patient, clasping the bars that hold her here,
While her great eyes go searching through the night
For the very saints themselves, who will not see . . . !
Maudlin? Not I! Blasphemy? There's a word
To reckon with! I crave your best discretion.
Let us go out—the air is better there.

[ 58 ]
I have not slept tonight, but drunk too deep.
Wine twists the tongue most strangely, and I spoke
Thoughts not my own.—And now the dawn is here—
They stir above—I’m very tired—and too—
I drank much wine—last evening by the fire.

They burn a witch today—I burn a witch.—
A woman fighting for the King of France—
So very queer—I want to sleep—it seems
I did sleep—and I dreamed—unholy dreams—
Give me your arm—thank you—I walk quite well—
Is it not pious thus to burn a witch?

PYGMALION AND GALATEA
White sand and water green, long serpent lines
Of white foam hissing on the Cyprian shore,
And a sea-nymph with malice in her heart,
And one poor, prudent king, walking alone,—
Thinking, perhaps, that he did not too ill
His royal task, thinking that he was kind,
And led his life of virtue blamelessly,—
And as he wandered, thinking not at all
That on the lee of yon lone, jutting rock,
Tranquility might drown in arms as white
As though they had been pure.

There was the nymph,—
She knew him for a king, and made her bow,
She knew him for a man, and flattered him
As any king or man would have her do,
Making him great with splendor not his own,
Giving him pride of might that tokened more
Than mere contentment, born of quiet days.
And then she spoke to him as one who knew,
Perchance, of love,— (as she herself did not) —
Besought him that he would relate some tale
Of tenderness,— the place befitted such,—
The twilight often moved her so, — would the king
Please to be rested here, upon the rock?
She knew a song,— strange,— from a distant land,—
Plaintive and amorous beneath the dusk.—

Pygmalion bethought him that her hair
Most curiously had caught the setting sun,
And that her eyes knew something of the green
Of the deep sea, feigning a twilight calm,
And that her breast was white.— Pygmalion
Most righteously was angered with the nymph
For seeming lovely to a good man’s eyes,
Making a sober monarch's evening stroll
On his own beach, appear a time of pleasure,
Bade her begone, and straightway took himself
Home to the safety of his chamber walls,
And lay, wide eyed, through all the limpid night.
He saw her face look laughing from the moon,
He watched her dancing on the silvered floor
With feet of silver light,—her fingers strayed,
And like the night wind, toyed about his hair
With some strange sorcery,—delightful guile.

He thought he could not love, and yet he lay
As a bewildered child, who happening
To stumble, half afraid, on fairyland,—
Knowing that he had found the end of quest-
ing,—
Knew also that no grimy little boys
Ever came back from that far, elfin home
To make mud pies contentedly once more.
Then tremblingly the king arose to bar
That mocking moon and her pale votary
Who set him mad with dancing down her beams.
It seemed that there was laughter in the light,
And whispers in the shadows of his trees,
And singing in the silver fountain-spray.
And the king knew that he should not again
Be happy in the solitude of nights,
Watching the mad moon-shadows on his wall.

[ 61 ]
There was a longing in his kingly soul
For some high-hearted love,—and yet he feared.
He would have had a wife to understand
How truly fine his spirit was,—to know
That he could love as well as any man
When in his mood,—and still he was afraid.
He thought that if he could but make a wife,
He might be rather happy by her side
Of moonlit nights,—and wondered if he would.

Then when the morning came, Pygmalion
Set out to make of ivory a maid
As fair as Galatea,—one who should
Not quite so wantonly disturb his dreams,
One who should bear her image perfectly,
But better suited to a quiet man.
Day after day he labored, thinking still
Of sea-wet limbs, white, on a black sea-rock,
And of the moonlight, slanting down his room,—
Wind in his hair—.

He was content again,
And found his art worthy an artist’s praise,
Admired aloud his craft and cleverness,—
“There is a charm about a chiselled wife,
About a spouse that’s carven to the taste,
Filed to the fancy, polished, tinted,—aye,
And silent!—'tis a thing unique in wives.
For no man finds perfection save where he Himself creates it,—there is nothing good
To man but man, and that which man has made.
These wives are an Olympian revenge,
Divinely shaped, without divinity,
Since ever Zeus proved sculptor, and a maid,—
That first enchanting and seductive clay,—
Lifted a box-lid! Let us take revenge
On vengeance.—There's an eyebrow there might lift
A trifle more,—that's hauteur,—but you'll note
The head's demurely turned,—a lash might brush
Upon this cheek with more humility
Than any god-made woman could display
Except she looked obedience by design,
Or languished to a purpose. That same nymph
Invites less sweetly with red, wanton lips
Than she whose smile is coral,—nay, her arms,
Her eager arms, that glisten from the waves
Gleam not so white as these, her hands that flash,
Gemmed with the sea, were never half so cool,
Nor ever folded in such mild repose.
I think a wife of ivory were best
For men who set a store by sanity,
Or for an artist who should love his art
And have his own mind to bestow on it,
Or for philosophers who must pretend
To understand most things beneath the stars,
But not a woman.

I'm a man who knows
Somewhat of art, and, yes,—philosophy.
I've seen Anaximander in my youth,
And all my people praise my chiselling,—
And I am king of Cyprus,—that's the net
The nymph was caught in—trust a woman's eye
To see the sparkle of a little gold,
Whether it bands the temples of a man,
Or wears his likeness on a polished face,—
It matters not.—She smiled, I shrugged, she pouted,
And then I went my way, very aloof,
Most unperturbed, despite the laugh I fancied
Might ring of mockery,—or likelier
Of some fine scheme I thwarted,—she's a woman!"

He paused, regarding her, this mistress mute,
This calm divinity, whose smile bespoke
No thought that might disturb a monarch's peace,
Whose eyes were lit with such sweet vacancy
That it was plain she'd be the best of wives,
And won without the wooing,—such a queen
As timid kings might cherish,—for her hands
Were made to move the melodies of lyres,
Or artfully to weave, or to caress
A man’s brow, tired with man’s pretentious game
Of playing pilot to the universe.
Her ears were made obedient to hear
How artists are misunderstood, and how
Her husband loves her,—when he thinks of it.
Her lips were made for pleasant flattery
Of a wifely sort,—yes, and for kissing, too,
At night and morning, and content with that.
She was as lovely as her counterpart
That dwelt among the caverns of the sea.
She shared the safeguard of a righteous roof,
She was not made to dream, nor know desire,—
It needs a subtle art to fashion souls!

Pygmalion, whose hands wrought skillfully,
Looked on her and was pleased, nor found a fault
With such a mistress, feeling quite secure
When left alone with only ivory
In his dim-lighted chamber. Once when the lamp
Made mimic shadows caper down the wall,
And lurk and leap in corners, mockingly,
He thought her eyelid flickered, or her chin
Tilted a bit coquettishly,—he swore
He’d never made her lip curve so.—He started,
Snuffed out the light, and hastily retired,
And next night set the lamp most cautiously
Elsewhere,—then moved it back again, and waited
Long past the hour of slumber, for her smile.

AT THE CUSTOMS

What am I bringing home you say?
Let me see!
The golden shawl was yet in the loom
On the island of Capri.
The two bronze griffins in Japan
I could not hope to carry,
The marble Magdalen in Rome,
The little green canary,
The German sampler worked in runes,
The canvas with the breathless sky,
The cuckoo-clock with the gay Swiss tunes,
Were all too high!
What am I bringing home you say?
Just small things!
A strand or two of coral beads
And a silver ring.

[ 66 ]
The painted vase from Venice
Was broken in the crating;
The pom-pom Turkish slippers
I lost by hesitating.
The wooden shoes from the Zuyder-Zee,
The dagger-hilt from old Coblenz,
The bottle of French Fleur-d-Leis
I sent ahead to friends.
What am I bringing home you say?
Nothing but what will be duty-free—
A kiss and a note from a boy on the boat,
And a great white shell from the sea.

LEAVES

I

I hate the people walking in the street
When hazy shadows thicken 'neath the trees,
I hate the sound of careless, shuffled feet,
When I would listen to the falling leaves.
I hate the strollers in the twilight mist,
Who linger in the drifting yellow rain
To chatter noisily, and scatter wide
The gleaming, golden heaps in rude disdain.
But most of all, when sunset fairies splash
The boughs with tints a mortal scarce conceives,
I hate the hand that sets man's lights aglow,
And steals the glory of the painted leaves.

II

The wise men, Lord, brought treasured perfumes sweet,
For they were men of wealth and affluence,
And laid their gifts of homage at your feet,
The precious myrrh, the fragrant frankincense;
And I, too, Lord, my soul enraptured with
The color-mingled miracle of fall,
In joyous gratitude and love, would bring
My gift, to the creator of it all;
Yet riches have I none. A single tree
Of living gold beside my doorstep grows,
And sends its showered wealth in dancing glee
To deck the earth with every breeze that blows.
I pile it high—a mass of shining bronze,
The leaping flame, a fitful pathway cleaves,
And softly rises my small tribute, Lord,
The incense of the burning, autumn leaves.

III

We sat upon the stairs; 'twas intertwined
With coppered branches; overhead a row
Of bright balloons was floating, lights were dim,
To muted strains the dancers glided slow.
"I love you, dear," I heard you whisper soft,
It did not please me and I shook my head,
My restless fingers, tracing with a pin
My name, upon a leaf of tarnished red.
You said it did not matter—and you smiled,
Your mocking eyes held not a sign of grief,
We went to dance, I thought it all a joke,
Until I saw you searching for that leaf.

WINTER

A gaunt ghost comes
To tread the stubbled prairie,
To lash the huddled cattle
And strip the walnut trees;
To moan among the timber-tops
And wail beneath the bridges,
To way-lay the weary water
As it struggles toward the sea.
A gaunt ghost comes—
But my heart no longer heeds
The sudden silence of the meadow,
Or the milk-weed blowing wide,
For, Oh, a grimmer phantom
Do I meet at every turning,
The ghost of him, departed,
Who did in Spring abide.

TO A LATE SNOW

Heap about the feet of April,
Beat against the breast of spring,
Flay the fields that yearn to tender
Gifts unto the violet-vender,
Bruise the maple one day longer,
Weigh the struggling robin’s wing.

Heap about the feet of April,
Let her not come pitcher-bearing,
Running, stumbling, drunk with laughter,
Slushing golden vintage after,
Down the hill, across the valley,
Drift her path, dismay her faring.

Heap about the feet of April
Ere my mad heart can defend her,
Ere my mad heart can adore her,
Pile thine icy wall before her,
Heap about the feet of April,
Let me not surrender.

HEARTBREAK

Heartbreak is such a little thing.
It only means that I shall never fling
Out to the skies songs that I used to sing.
It only means that I will never care
For loveliness in any lovely thing.
It only means that I shall never dare
To pause at dusk in this still room
Lest I should turn and find you there.
Ghost-like before me in the gloom.
Ah, yes, it is a little thing . . .
Days shrouded in stark emptiness,
Nights weary with remembering . . .
Why that is all that heartbreak is.

A CONCRETE SILO

I have seen beauty hovering
   Above a dogwood copse in spring
As if a million wax-white doves
   Had halted on the wing.

And once I found a little wood
   So still in autumn’s early cold,
I feared she had been taken there
   And cast in gold.

But lately in a prairie dawn
   I glimpsed her as we hurried by,
A shimmering shaft of pearl against
   A fading coral sky.

Paul Landis
When Helen, wrapped in shining veils,
And weeping with a sweet desire,
Went down the streets of wide-wayed Troy,
Braving the Trojans’ ire;
Two captive maidens by her side
Walked to immortality—
Aithre, daughter of Pittheos,
And ox-eyed Clymene.

Daughters of kings and gods they were,
Yet not for this through sundering years
Their names are lovely as the bright
Beauty of Helen’s tears;
But mindful of her loneliness,
In times distraught and desolate,
Sadly but fearlessly they walked
With Beauty to the Skæan Gate.

He turned upon this world of men and things
And God himself the light of reason, white
With noble fearlessness, and in the night
Of sentiment and cowardice that clings
About our minds, his brave imaginings
Showed what we scarce dared look upon for fright:

[72]
The momentary glory of the flight—
The ultimate futility of wings.
Yet still his ancient enemy obtains,
For it is nature's way that where the light
Is clearest, there the darkest shadows are.
Truth but reveals what mystery remains;
And men become grotesques against the glare
Of bonfires blazing on the heath at night.

Paul Landis

Love and glass and the stem of a flower
Are breakable things, and prudent men
Are not beguiled by the toys of an hour,
That break and may never be mended again.

Iron and wheat and the staid affection
That grows from mutual gain and esteem—
These are the stones for the safe erection
Of a life that is something more than a dream.

If this be the truth without misgiving,
What is the reason that life which springs
From more than a dream is less than living,
And beauty abides in breakable things?

Paul Landis
On reflecting that whereas other poets have succeeded in writing very competently about spring, I seem to lack inspiration this April.

Swinburne with his Atalanta
Took a most æsthetic fling
At a preliminary canter
Riding to the hounds of Spring.

'Twas a great day in the annals
Of the muses, if you please,
When Wordsworth shed his winter flannels
And put on his B.V.D's.

Then the heart within him stirred.
Penned he stanzas rich and juicy,
All about the cuckoo bird
And the witless maiden Lucy.

Blake went on a piping bat with
Chanting mutton on the hoof.
On a cloud he saw a brat with Something wrong beneath his roof.

Now the weather's getting vernal;
Yet, whene'er I want to shout
Stanzas that shall be eternal,
What is there to write about?

[ 74 ]
Cuckoos seem to dodge South Busey.
All Spring lambs are on the table.
Witless maidens aren't like Lucy.
Hounds of Spring are but a fable.

Daffodils begin to peer.
Every day I'm getting dumber.
Well, Spring comes but once a year.
Thank the Lord, 'twill soon be Summer.

WE THREE

There are three men that are I,
Imprisoned in the frame of me,
And all shall die.

One shall die in a quiet bed,
With a light above him;
And she whose shadow he had fled
Shall be there to love him;
The broken body that is dead,
And the ashes of him.

One shall die as a hero dies,
With a chain of steel men to speed his going,
And a tall blaze inflaming the skies,
And a circle of cressets glowing

[ 75 ]
ILLINI POETRY

About the body where it lies,
And the long horns blowing.

And one shall pass by the gates of morning,
In the brightening glow;
With a shaft from the curve of the sky adorning
The water below;
Quiet, without a sound of mourning,
The last to go.

SONNETS

I

Two slipped into the sky, a hollow vessel,
And saw how, tipped along its curving rim
A marble mortar with a silver pestle,
It pounded up their lives, and from the brim
Poured them, a potion crushed from rigid form,
Reduced to elements of fire and air.
They moved like swimmers drifting in a storm
Out into unruled space, they knew not where.

We do not know what hand of will or matter
Flung like quicksilver down the shining pole
Their being, with an aim to sift and shatter

[76]
The substance that still clung about the soul.
We only know that stars stood by to see,
Reduplicate in multiplicity.

II
They saw, those two, where from a sea of æther,
The long swell beat on planetary strands.
They saw the moon, a broken shell; beneath her
Sprawled the wide earth, still flecked with astral bands.
And motion, dropping, left their flying feet.
Unseen, they ripped across an airless void
To where four stars, wrapped in a glimmering heat,
Rolled slowly out to form a trapezoid.

Now down, now up along the cleft abyss
Veered other worlds, swirling a wake of fire.
The fluted ether made for them a prism
Through which their sloping walls seemed tilted higher.
And asteroids revolved, to fall and climb
Measured in spinning melodies of time.

Locked on the burning axle of the wheel
They saw the spokes shaft outward, fringed with flame.
Cauterized by a fire they could not feel,
They turned to see horizons still the same.
Flung by some flutter of the universe,
Whirled outward through a belt of frozen air,
They struck the moving ocean, to immerse
Star-beaten limbs, and quench their flaming hair.

So, out of strange mutations, out of light
And time illimitable, skyey spaces,
Once more terrestrial, glowing silver-white
They move like dancers back into their places.
And from the oubliette of earthly things
Two beings cut the shadow, and have wings.

RICHMOND A. LATTIMORE

LUCRETIUS

He saw the sunrise on the murmurous sea,
The motion of the tempests that uncurled
Their power against the mountains, mightily,
Suns, planets, all the flame-encircled world:
Then looked on man, the credulous and blind,
And wrought to inward passion of despair
Arose, drew back the curtains of the mind,
And laid the spinning mechanism bare.

He saw, and there were storm clouds in his sight.
He heard earth-music and was strong with wonder.
His mind was flooded with increasing light,
And when he spoke he loosed a chain of thunder
In lines that no less mightily rehearse
The ponderous rhythm of the universe.

CLYTAEMNESTRA

Hands delicate to soften and to slay
Were hers who struck the captain of the ships
With rending steel, when in too brave array
He came to read a welcome on her lips.
A white flame kindled slowly in her heart,
Tempering her straining nerves to do a thing
Stupendous and unholy, when by art
And strength she slaughtered her gigantic king.

So, marble-limbed and whitely statuesque,
As if some man had moulded into grace
The rugged stone, she stood there while grotesque
Emotions weirdly played across her face.
And pale before the threat of stones and rods
She dared the flying thunder of the Gods.

CASSANDRA
She walked alone upon the battlements.
Beneath the dawn the Grecian charioteers
Yoked their swift horses. From the wakening tents

Rose a small tumult, and the twinkle of spears
Seen faintly over the wide dew-gleaming plain.
The men were making ready. Another day
Slipped to the notch that she had seen in vain.
She waited. There was nothing left to say.

She stood in the cold wind, and closed her eyes,
And heard the crash of falling cities, saw
The cringe of spear-torn flesh, the glint of skies
Above strange galleys, and the reaching claw
Of an axe curved above her throat. The fated Armies of Troy went forth. She stood and waited.

UNIMPORTUNATE

She, at least, will ask no sonnets of me,
But only smile and take my words instead;
And she would still believe in me and love me
Though all the poetry of earth were dead.
Though songs that I might sing would be forgotten,
She, at least, would not upbraid and sigh,
Thinking of the joys that are begotten
Of a little love, before we come to die.

Thus, making no pretense, no idle chatter
Of my fair phrases, mouthed so many times,
She knows that they will never really matter,
And loves me for myself, not for my rhymes,
Closing my mouth with kisses, lest I break
Into a lovelier sonnet, for her sake.

SENEX

When I can look at life and love it more
For what I give than what it gives to me,
Dreaming of what has nobly gone before
Instead of what comes gloriously to be;
Vexing no more a too rebellious heart
With hopes long fostered of the imperious mind,
Content at last, austerely drawn apart
From the long sightless errands of the blind—

Dwelling upon some mountain crag in Greece
Or castle in Capri, I shall have time
To contemplate in everlasting peace
How, sacred still from my small thirsty rime,
Only the ancient verities remain:
Life, and the end of life, and love, and pain.

"Stephen, put your book away and run
Down to the store. There's company for tea,
And nothing in the house for anyone
To eat. Bring back a cake and . . . now let's see . . .
Oh, yes; some cream, and half a dozen rolls,
There's money for you; hurry lad."
And like a runner to unimagined goals,
The boy ran down the porch, not overglad
To be thus snatched from fairyland. Bright swords
Clashed in his heart, and Lancelot drove hard
His spear among the host, and many lords,
Fighting and dying, in armor bent and scarred,
Rose shouting from the pages flung behind.
The street was hot, and life was most unkind.

VOICELESS

This is a word that needs no saying:
The heart will hear though the voice be still,
As the flower hearkens to Springtime, straying
Along the slope of an April hill;
As the swallow hears in the night-winds crying
ILLINI POETRY

A sound that the earth has never heard,
Lost in the dark and the mist, gone flying
Over the world like a frightened bird.

Mute are the lips that would be speaking
Words that no lips have uttered quite
So sweet to her, whom the heart goes seeking,
A scattered mote from the dawn-star's light.
Brave is the wish that the lips can cherish
Still, in the face of a dark defeat;
But what if they speak, and their soft words perish,
As all words must, in the noisy beat

Of striving bodies, the ancient clamor
That stirs the limbs to their bitter toil?
The earth is an anvil and man a hammer,
Fashioning life from the yielding soil.
But love is a glorious muteness, bringing
More joy than our twisted words can tell;
It is the voice of silence singing
A song that the stones and the trees know well.

Come, love, in the stillness of evening lying,
We shall be silent and speak no word;
The tongue is clever at falsifying;
The heart speaks truth—and it shall be heard.

[ 83 ]

Silence alone is more strong than thunder;

Of speechless things, I shall speak to you.

XENOPHANES, AP. ATH.

So might we say, by the fire lying
On a soft couch in the winter chill,
Sated, drinking the sweet wine, plying
The stomach with roasted chick-peas still:

"Whence do you come, O gallant stranger,
   And what, pray tell us, may be your name?
How many are yours of the years that change, sir?
   How old were you when the Persian came?"

TO SHELLEY

Three Sonnets from the Prize Poem of 1928

I

There is only one: there cannot be another
To soar again on such unearthly wings
As yours, O Ariel! Adonais' brother,
Amid the realm of the spirit's wanderings.
No one again to break his heart with dreaming.

ILLINI POETRY

No one to triumph over time and death,
And none to tremble with such glorious scheming
As yours—to faint with beauty, to lose breath.

Before the world’s deep sorrow—you have broken
The bonds of earth: they but half held you fast:
You are one with all the voices that have spoken
As “trumpets of a prophecy”—O last
And bravest of the mighty hearts, gone singing
Into the plangent night, lone bird of passage winging!

II

Your voice is in the note of a distant lyre
Struck passionately over Grecian seas,
And where the flames of Attic suns expire
Upon the “violet crown,” its melodies
Borne onward by the streams of Ocean, flowing
In rhythmic waves of rising music, sound
Like the old sea-god’s wondrous shell-horn, blowing
Through Western lands and Western seas around.

O spirit whom the world and all its narrow Fetters could never bind. Life knows you still

[85]
As some bright, flame-tipped, upward-arching arrow
Shot to the heavens from an English hill,
Piercing the breast of mankind with a pang
Where, through the bronze of Time, the shining missile rang.

In what high hour, beyond all re-possessing,
Did love beget you, wayward child of song.
So weak to bear, so brave to sing the pressing
Weight of a passion grown at last too strong?
Born to a lot as heavy as that wasted
And vulture eaten one's who dared the brief
And dire patience of the gods, you tasted
The wine of sorrow and the bread of grief.

But the white flame you bore to men burns brightly
Where every spirit that is free must gaze
And gather comfort in its splendor, nightly
Speeding the darkness with its steadfast blaze,
Remembering you, Prometheus who rounded
A silvery triumph-hymn, where a soul's struggle sounded.

DIVAGATION OF A MAN AND HIS WIFE
A Dramatic Phantasy
Prize Poem, 1927
being a serio-comic phantasy with a preface

Preface

Anything may happen when a young London clerk and his wife go walking, in the sweetly solemn hour of a Spring twilight, through Regent’s Park or, say, the Paddington Recreation Ground. They may talk of anything or nothing; they may clasp hands and run a bit across the grass; they may sit on a bench and quarrel—or plan the morrow’s dinner. They will certainly, being young, talk of the future; and, if they have children at home, their speculative conversation will be quite serious. They will speak perhaps of death; but they will also speak of life.

It is this indecisive mood of two married lovers, at an hour when almost anything may happen, that I have tried to capture in my poem; and to those who will call it illogical, who will say that it has no head or tail and very little body, I can only reply that life itself is singularly illogical, and that to endow it with a head or tail is to make ludicrous, thereby, the mysteries of birth and death.

Down what strange road shall you and I
Go together, when we die?
Beneath what fearful, lovely trees
Shall we walk lightly as a breeze?
    Look, my love, the night grows weird
And wispy like a pirate’s beard.
What moon-lit alley-ways shall find
Our feet pursuing, where they wind
Among the dead and dying years,
The shadows of our silly fears?
    The moon, like a bowl of cottage cheese
    Molded in strange butteries,
    Tilts between the curds of night
    And spills a whey of milky light.
Shall you be frightened? Shall I play
A masque to drive your fears away,
A game beneath Plutonic firs

[88]
By ruined, empty sepulchers?
Cling to me, dear; we have come
A long and weary way from home.
These are not the woods we knew,
Where strawberries and violets grew.
These are not at all the ways
We trod in other sunny days.
We shall know, in that strange land,
All we could never understand;
What happens to the falling rose,
And where the tattered twilight goes;
How the candle fingers catch
Pale life again beneath the match;
Why the dawn grows pink and red—
In that far country of the dead.
Queer! the town lay over there,
But now it is not anywhere.
And if I heard you laugh before,
I do not hear you any more.
Then life and love shall both be plain

[89]
And sharp as lilacs in the rain;
There will not be a shred of doubt
To vex our coming in and out.
The world above shall turn and turn
Like some vast agonizing churn.
And, with the changing shadows, we Shall saunter through Eternity.

I do not feel upon my arm
The pressure of your fingers, warm
And fragrant with the scent of life.
Like a nicked and blunted knife,
The wind has slipped across my cheek.
Look upon me, dearest—speak!

Never shall the front door bang,
Where fireflies like lanterns hang.
We shall not look again upon
Our small domestic Babylon. . . .
The alarm clock with the broken spring,
Canary bird that would not sing;
The arm chair with the leather seat,
Our book case, with "Shakespeare —Complete."

[90]
The squeaky faucet in the sink,
My study desk, leprous with ink;
The bath tub, with its nickeled knot
And everlasting lie of “HOT.”

What was that, dear? did you see
That twisted shape behind the tree?
Shape or ghost, I could not tell,
It fled away so fast and well.
But can this be—dear, I shall play
A masque to drive your fears away.

In that pale land, we shall be glad
And most perpetually gay;
We shall not mourn the lives we had
Nor weary for a brisker day.

And, chattering with the wraithes that rove,
I shall talk of poetry,
Of girls with whom I fell in love,
And similar philosophy.

We are very silly, dear,
To be so morbid, while the year
Sings through the garden like a tune
Played upon the harp of June.
I will kiss your mouth and then
We shall talk of life again,
Of Paris and of picture-plays,
Of dances in our college days.
We are too young to ape the old
With closet-tales—dear, you are cold!
Life and death have merged beyond
All hope for me to break the bond!
Heavens! are we truly dead?
Our bodies are not buried!
Ah God! we move and seek to cry.
It is too late for us to die
Among the kindly homes of men!
Too late for us to find again
The comfort of a coffin bed,—
Darling, we are already dead!
O cruel death, that we should be Caught helpless by Eternity!
Unkindly death, thus unawares
To catch us while we bandied cares

[92]
Of household and of husbandry,
Æsthetics and philosophy!
This was not how at all, we say,
We thought that we should "pass away"!
As unobtrusively as night,
As limply as a squeezed delight,
Without the glamour of a tomb
To make them whisper in the room
Where we should die a proper death
And draw a last appropriate breath!
We have not even touched the bed
Where people weep when life has fled,
Bringing condolence and sighs
To swell our earthly Paradise.
Why, you have cheated us of all
The smelly flowers around the wall!

I saw how Jones, the lawyer, went
When his feeble life was spent,
Leaving earth and sky and tree,
His children and his wife and me
With little to remember by . . .
That was a petty way to die.

[ 93 ]
She speaks, not to be outdone.

And I saw how my maiden aunt,
Who never let her parrot want,
But never gave ten pounds or five
To keep a crippled child alive,
I saw how she said her good-bye . . .
It was a paltry way to die.

O never ask where he has gone,
What baleful latch-string she has drawn;
Neither lived for more than life
And neither knew the heart’s red strife,
The pain of empty after-while
That only brings a crooked smile
To lips that disappointment fills
With outward mirth and inward chills.
They chewed a stale and broken crust—

[94]
They laugh, they brighten; these things being inevitable.

In an excited medley of wistful reminiscence.

They laugh, they brighten; these things being inevitable.

In an excited medley of wistful reminiscence.

Ashes to ashes, dust to dust.
The shadows are more friendly here
Than sunshine on a shiny bier:
And we shall make a home as well
Here, be it Heaven or be it Hell.

Do you remember how the vines,
With wild-cucumber porcupines
Upon them, grew across the porch?
How we lit the penny torch
Upon the eve of Guy Fawkes day,
Then threw the smouldered end away?

Do you recall the children's schemes,
And how we read the "Hill of Dreams"?
Which arm was broken on the day
You stumbled down the cellar way?

Oh, this is better than old age
On earth, where but the printed page
Held both our heart's felicity.

Remember Jock and Cecily!

Forgive me. There was more than books,
And more than merely longing looks
At Beauty far beyond our grasp;
There was the muggy little clasp
Of little hands upon my knee,
And little voices spoke to me.
Beauty that was huggable,
Immediate and lovable;
A loveliness that could not fade—
But, dear—the awful noise they made!

She (tartly):

Just like a man to fume about
The children's going in and out!
No wonder you were company
Too often for your books—not me.
O dear, shall we begin to quarrel?
Aren't even ghosts genteel and moral?

He (compassionately, withal proudly):

Little wife, I know that I
Too often made you sit and cry.
A brute—but many times, I think,
I washed the dishes in the sink.

She (scornfully):

Oh you, with your small dignity
Of dishes and such frippery!
I often worked twelve hours or more,

[ 96 ]
And walked the babies on the floor,
Changed diapers when there was need
And tied the thumbs that just would bleed.
You dare to talk of pots and pans?
Oh, men are vain as caravans?

Don't let us quarrel; here, I'll sing
A love-song for your pleasuring:

I will not go into the town,
Though once the town was fair;
There are too many hostile eyes
To look upon me there.

But I shall go to Arcady
And bring you back a faun;
That will dry the tears away
You wept while I was gone.

O hear me, love, the night twists down,
And I will come again
When all the bravest sunbeams run
To wrestle with the rain.
He (eagerly):

Now didn't that make you feel as though
Your row was not so hard to hoe?
Of course, I didn't make a rhyme
Of Hyde Park in the summer time,
Or Hammersmith when evening falls
Along the Thames embankment walls;
And then my poem is quite askew
Without a line concerning Kew.
But, dear, you like it? Tell me so.
Your husband is a poet, no?

Very pretty, but I fear
That singing brings no shelter here
Bestir yourself! Winds blow in

If this be it, and Heaven as well.
Like twisted pearls across the sky,
April's rounded clouds go by,
And eyes will follow as they go,
For homing hearts will have it so.
But I would have a friendly mouse,
A hole for it—in fact, a house.

These shadows going to and fro,
What do they think, what can they know?
That withered little memory
Of some poor life's poor tragedy,
He was a good man, I suppose,
But now a ruined wraith he goes,
Stumbling from tree to tree,—
As insignificant as we.
That darker shadow, feminine,
Being softer and more fine,
A hag, where once a goddess came—
Ashes now, where once was flame.

What utter sentimental rot!
Will you remember we have not
A home among these shadows yet?
You dear old drooping violet!
Come, with all these shapes that roam,
We will go and find a home,
A place in which to put our feet
And cook a bite or two to eat.
From grotesque depths their eyes shall peer,
Wondering why we tarry here.
And, shaking their unearthly heads,
They'll totter to their clammy beds.

Prize Poem, 1929

"It sounds like a fairy tale. You like fairy tales?"
"I do," replied Denis.
"Then we have one point in common. I could listen to them for hours. There is something eternal about them."

PART I: THE CASTLE-OF-QUIET-SLEEP

I—At twilight-time
II—The great-towered castle
III—Of passing years

I
At twilight-time the drowsy robins fold
Their wings, the squirrels all forget to scold

[100]
The blue-jays, and the purple shadows creep
Away from tree and bush, and take the steep
Highroad to where the evening lands unfold.

The Sandman's shepherd gathers in the sheep,
And counts them on his fingers as they leap
The bar, until the last is in the fold
At twilight-time.

The children stop their play, and seek the old
Dames nodding in the doorway to be told
Of elf and gnome and giant in the deep,
Dark forest round the Castle-of-Quiet-Sleep,
Whose high stone roofs and towers turn to gold
At twilight-time.

II

The great-towered castle—so the grandams say—
Lies under the enchantment that a fay
Cast over its grey roofs. The watchman stands
On guard with sleep-blind eyes. The minstrel bands
Do-re-mi-fa inaudibly their lay.
In the great banquet hall no bright-flamed brands
Flare on the smoke-stained walls, and Sleep commands
The lords and gallant ladies that made gay
The great-towered castle.

For all within the silent walls will stay
Enchanted by the spell, until the day
A prince comes riding from the purple lands
Beyond the sun, and opens with young hands
An ancient iron gate that shuts away
The great-towered castle.

Of passing years the sleepers take no care.
His Majesty sits dozing in his chair
Of state. The kitchen boy drives sleeping flies
Away from dusty soup. The Chancellor tries
To hide a yawn. The guardsmen in the square
Pay no attention to the changing skies,
But stand like statues to immortalize
Their order. All are captured in the snare
Of passing years.

In the dark Tower of the Winding Stair,
Alone, with scarlet poppies in her hair
And lonely shadows in her dream-filled eyes,
In quiet rest the Sleeping Beauty lies,
Unmindful of the world and unaware
Of passing years.

PART TWO: THE CHRISTENING FEAST

I—Once on a time

II—Old Master Stork

III—Six golden plates

IV—The Fairy Glower

V—The Fairy Gentle

VI—Throughout the land

I

Once on a time, in days of crinoline
And powdered wigs, there lived a king and queen
Whose legendary kingdom was ruled best
Of all the lovely meadow-countries west
Of Fairyland. The river Serpentine

Meanders through the land in its sea-quest,
And though there are no black ships to molest
Its tranquil waters now, there might have been
   Once on a time.

The house-wives always keep their kitchens clean.
All of the pointed roofs are painted green.
In every other elm tree is a nest
Of wrens, and underneath, the old men rest
And dream of flame-speared armies they have seen
   Once on a time.

[ 103 ]
II
Old Master Stork, who owns and operates
The baby-farm, bobbed at the delegates
Sent by the Queen, and, pleased to gratify
Her Majesty, went flapping through the sky

(For he is always willing to comply
With such requests. That is the reason why,
In that fair land, nobody ever hates
   Old Master Stork,
Except when he forgets and triplicates
An order!) When the royal magistrates
Came with the news, the good king winked one eye,
Rose joyously, and cried: “A toast, say I,
A bumper to that prince of reprobates,
   Old Master Stork!”

III
Six golden plates the Majordomo bought,
Stamped with the royal crest and finely wrought.
He stored the cellar full of ginger-beer,
And stocked the pantry-shelves with partridge, deer,
And fat Welsh-rabbits that the huntsmen caught.

[104]
The six old grey-eyed fairies who lived near Flew on their broom-sticks to the feast, with queer
Soft bundles. To the fairy guests were brought Six golden plates.

During the feast a page advanced and sought
The king. "Your majesty," he said, "What ought
We do—there is a glum old party here
Who..." "—'Sblood!" exclaimed his Majesty,
"My dear, We have forgot..." "Alack!", the poor queen thought,
"Six golden plates!"

IV
"The Fairy Glower!" said a trembling page
And ushered in an old hag bent with age,
Who scowled and blinked her piggish eyes with hate.
And when they served her with a silver plate,
She cackled and her small head shook with rage.

After the feast each fairy gave a trait
Or charm to the wee child in the crib of state,
And last of all came that dour personage—
The Fairy Glower.
"The wan fire-blossoms of the night presage,
O child, thou'lt not acquire thy heritage,
For thou shalt prick thy fingers on a straight
Sharp spindle's point and die. Such is thy fate.
Beware, proud king, how lightly you enrage
"The Fairy Glower!"

V

The Fairy Gentle had retired behind
A curtain, guessing what was in the mind
Of her sour relative, and did not dare
Come out till she had vanished in green air.
The fairy then said gently, "I divined

All this, O king, yet I was not aware
How to prevent it, but do not despair,
For when the sleep-spell comes, Sire, you shall find

The Fairy Gentle.

"The princess shall not wander in the blind
Shadowy realms of Death. A Fate more kind
Ordains that she lie sleep-enchanted there
In the dark Tower of the Winding Stair
A hundred years. So do the Weird Ones bind

[ 106 ]
"Throughout the land let every spindle be Destroyed at once!" exclaimed his majesty. "Odds bobbs! we'll show that hag how much we fear Her spells. Go summon all the heralds here, And we, ourself, shall tell them our decree!"
The heralds, dressed in all their splendid gear, Through every town and village cried their queer Decree, till they had wandered blatantly Throughout the land.

The good wives were distressed, but willingly Destroyed their spindles, save one crotchety Old court-dame who had lived for many a year In a forgotten tower and did not hear The bright-plumed heralds marching solemnly Throughout the land.

PART THREE: THE MAGIC WOOD

I—Year after year
II—One winter day
III—Without a sound
IV—As snow came down

[ 107 ]
Year after year, as changing seasons pass,
The princess grew into a bright-haired lass,
Who played at keeping house beneath a white
Pavilion, helped the pages fly their kite,
And hunted four-leaf clovers in the grass.

One vague dread sometimes marred the queen’s delight.
She saw the light hours pass in steady flight,
The golden sands fall slowly through the glass,
Year after year.

“Alas . . .
Poor child . . .” “Pooh!” said the king. “Next Michaelmas
She’s only seventeen!” The queen was right
As usual. The princess saw a knight—
And spent more time before her looking-glass
Year after year.

One winter day the princess watched the snow
Come drifting slowly down. “I did not know
There was so much!”—she smiled. “The snowflakes fall
As if Old Mother Goose were plucking all
The geese in heaven. The dead garden's so
Forlorn and desolate! and how the tall
Slim maples shiver with the cold! The hall,
I think, is a more cheerful place to go,
One winter day,

"Than in the garden where the white winds blow."
And through the empty rooms she walked with slow
Echoing steps until she saw a small
Grey door. There was no answer to her call,
But only laughter in the hall below,
One winter day.

Without a sound the princess groped her way
Along, keeping her scarlet dress away
From the damp walls, nor stopping to explore
The cobwebbed depths, until she reached a door
Small as the first. She opened it half-way,

Looked in, and saw an antique dame who wore
A much-patched skirt and bodice. From her store
Of wool the woman spun long threads of grey
Without a sound.

[109]
The princess, watching, said: "Please, Granny, may I try?" "Try spinning, did I hear you say? Here is the spindle, child..." She had no more than touched it when she fell, and on the floor all in a heap of gold and scarlet lay, without a sound.

IV

As snow came down the courtiers dolefully laid the fair child beneath a canopy of silver cloth, and left her in the dark, there in the lonely tower where the lark sang in the Spring. Then Sleep came quietly over the heavy hearts left in the stark old castle, and the last dull-glowing spark died in the pale white ashes, wearily as snow came down.

That evening the tired carles that leisurely trudged homeward were dumfounded not to see the many-towered palace in the park, and stood in quiet wonderment to mark the forest that had grown up silently as snow came down.

PART FOUR: A PRINCE COMES RIDING

I—The moon looked down
II—In the dark tower
III—With a long kiss
IV—The princess smiled

I

The moon looked down upon the castle walls,
Making light trickle down, as water falls
On silver stones, and long black shadows streak
The gleaming battlements. Here lovers speak
No vows, and no sleep-muddled watchman bawls
A challenge at the prince who comes to seek
A shelter and a warm fire. On his cheek
And helmet moonbeams lingered. Hearing his calls

The moon looked down.

"That's funny . . ." thought the prince. "I doubt if all's
Quite right. Why should the lord not have his thralls
On guard?" He hammered on the gate. The weak
Rust-bitten lock swung open with a creak,
And as he vanished in the somber halls

The moon looked down.

[111]

II

In the dark tower, as if he could foresee
What was to come, a guard moved drowsily.
The prince knocked on the oaken door. No word
Came back to him. He knocked again . . . the blurred
Stone passage-ways reechoed mockingly.

"I doubt if they have ears, for no one heard
That knocking!" thought the prince. A bird
Flew past. The sleepers breathed uneasily

In the dark tower.

He rubbed his doubting eyes, amazed to see
The lords and ladies smiling stonily,
Just as they were when the magic spell occurred.
The princess, dreaming of a kiss, half-stirred
Beneath the silken-shadowed canopy

In the dark tower.

III

With a long kiss the young prince broke the spell.
The princess sighed as his dark shadow fell
Across her face. Being a youth of tact,
He chose to wake her with a gracious act . . .
A shorter kiss would have done just as well.

[112]
The dogs began to bark, the ducks quack-quacked,
The babies squallled until their mothers smacked
Them roundly. There was a row no prince could quell

With a long kiss.

All in one breath the women tried to tell
A century of dreams. The palace bell
Pealed fifteen thousand times before it cracked,
And over the cobblestones the sabots clacked,
As if the prince had loosed the Fiends of Hell
With a long kiss.

The princess smiled and listened to the gay
Confusion in the castle. "Weylaway!"
Exclaimed the sleep-befuddled sovereign, winking
At his exasperated spouse, then, sinking
Down in his chair, dozed off without delay.

There was a sound of golden goblets clinking
In the great hall where all the court sat drinking,
And while the minstrel sang a roundelay
The princess smiled.
The young prince whispered, as the purple day
Crept home to sleep, such things as lovers say.
Suddenly he stopped and sat up, blinking.
And when the princess asked what he was thinking,
He said, "What if I'd gone the other way!"
         The princess smiled.

ONLY
    Only the sky and the wet wind's shadow
Clouded and cool
Over the twilight and dripping meadow
And treeless pool—
Never the duck nor the wild drake calling
Lonely and harsh
Only the rain, hushed and silent, falling
On reaching marsh . . .
Grasses and rain and sweet white clover,
Hollowless, hill-less, the dim lands over.

The wan moon's wandering daughter.

Who had a soul of water.

THE SINGING BIRD

A black tree on a golden hill,
Still, still, my heart, still
And in the bough a singing bird,
Still, my heart.

The white bird singeth sweet and shrill,
Still, still, my heart, still.
And who enchanted hath not heard?
Still, my heart.

He hath no wisdom nor no will,
Still, still, my heart, still.
Yet singeth my soul mad in me,
Still, my heart.

And I will hearken here until,
Still, still, my heart, still.
My soul hangs high upon the tree,
Still—my heart.

SONG

(Of One Grown Weary of Enchantment)
Incubi and succubæ,
Demons who enchanted me,
When beneath the fallow moon
Wandered I in search of cover,
ILLINI POETRY

Weave thy thrice-entwinéd spell,
Staff and symbol, book and bell,
Sing again the secret rune,
Find for me a mortal lover!

Hand of shadow, lip of mist,
Foot of fog and wrist of dust,
Voice that speaks a hidden tongue,
Eye that no sun shall discover—
Sick am I of phantom men!
Make thy moon-dark spell again,
Let the secret rune be sung . . .
Snare for me a mortal lover!

EVENING

Evening is a servant girl.
   She wraps the golden Day
Into a cloak of rose and pearl
   And saffron and dove-gray.
The lady meets her lover, Night,
   And Evening steals away,
So there is none can tell aright
   Of the wooing of the Day.

GOING DOWN TO LONDON

I’m going down to London
When the year is in the spring,
And I shall buy a whistle
And I shall buy a ring.

I’ll walk among the gardens—
Perhaps I’ll pick a rose,
Or follow a pretty maiden
Wherever the maiden goes;

And if she’s selling flowers,
I’ll buy some of her wares,
And tell her that I love her
And ask her if she cares.

We’ll sit on the bank of the river
And watch the old men fish;
We’ll see some milk-white horses
And then we’ll make a wish—

And she will wish for romance,
And I will wish for fame,—
And she’ll shed a tear at parting
For her loves are all the same.

And when the spell is over,
I’ll come home to Dorsetshire,

EASTER PRELUDE

Hushed is every living thing,
Expectant, leaning on the air
To hear the earthly silence bear
The first faint sounds of spring.

Sinner, pauper, rich man, saint—
Slough the winter's tyrannies
And rend from April's heresies
The garments of restraint.

Time, the sage immutable,
Contemplates the ancient scene;
Smiles with wooden lips serene—
And stays inscrutable.

For this mortality is frail
And men forget they are not gods—
And fondly turn against the odds
That they shall fail.

ILLINI POETRY

Drab penitence the spring annuls
And men forget at Eastertide
That prelude where three felons died
At the place of skulls.

TO A CERTAIN GARDEN

Now ere the moon wanes and the night is clouded,
While the dim winds blow softly on apace,
Here where the quiet is so closely shrouded
In this old garden, sweet as a petaled face,
Young lovers make of moonlight a white fancy
And girlish laughter tinkles through the gloom,
Mindless of time and caverned from the sunlight,
Like golden legends in a leaden tomb.

They do a grace for one whose day was broken
And whose young fame first walked among these flowers;
And even the prettiest vows so lightly spoken
Seem the faint echoes of those earlier hours
When beat the golden bird on silent wing,
And one awoke and heard the planet sing.

Bruce Weirick
ILLINI POETRY

BALLAD OF HENRY VIII

To a lyric panegyric, though in theme a bit satiric
On a topic misanthropic
Let the muse attune her lay;
While with harmonies euphonic, though perhaps somewhat sardonic
And laconic’ly ironic
Let the chronic cynic play.

I shall take as my protagonist that conjugal hexagonist,
With brevity and levity
Relate his escapades
And without abuse or slandering recount his gay philandering,
His wandering meandering,
His pandering with maids.

So attend, while I with gaiety interpret for the laity,
Capriciously, facetiously
The monarch’s woes and cares.
I’ll explain with dramaturgy how His Highness did the clergy
And with humor tell the rumor
Of his numerous affairs.
His father, quite pragmatic’ly, betroth’d him morganatic’ly
Unto a dame of haughty name
Whose people came from Spain;
To-wit, to Kate of Aragon whom he believed a paragon.
Boy!—She had it, was wholly fit
Upon the throne to reign.

They settled down to nidify, the kingdom to solidify
With dower from the power
Of the sour Spanish house;
When alas!—That lovely Spanish figure soon began to vanish.
“We can’t have that! She’s far too fat!
I’ll hunt another spouse.”

Society’s propriety became a d—ned satiety,
The monarch craved variety
From piety and vows.
Though monogamy’s salubrious it left the king lugubrious,
The lust for sin with Anne Bolyn
Within him did arouse.

But the pope was quite pedantic and an antic so romantic
Drove him very nearly frantic

[121]
And it got him rather hot,
And though Woolsey waxed right voluble the bond remained insoluble.
The saintly pope responded: “Nope, We can’t untie the knot.”

Now, it’s quite apodeictical that such a ghastly spectacle
Of bicker with the vicar
Made him sicker than a fish,
So he wrote a curt epistle with his cardinal’s dismissal
To the duffer who was buffer
And must suffer for his wish.

“The orders I’ll administrate; the papacy defenestrate.
The papal bull I shall annul
Albeit it gets him sore,
For there’s nothing more engaging than to see a prelate raging
When it’s futile”; with these brutal Words he cast him out the door.

And by practices nefarious he named himself vicarious,
The fount and source of all divorce

[122]
And marital relief.
His other loves were various, his passions multifarious,
Too manifold here to be told
In poesy so brief.

An existence so uxorious at length becomes laborious,
Expires and retires
From the lyres of his bard.
Though he's now a stark cadaver his apologists palaver
To exonerate and exculpate
But find it rather hard.

Now, 'tis not for me, his laureate, the monarch to excoriate,
Or witticize; or criticize
Connubial archives,
But, boys! before we peculate illicit love let's speculate,
And count expense and consequence
Of feeding many wives.
